Specifically (a) A claw or talon; a falcula. (b) A tusk. [Prov. Eng.] (c) A long, sharp tooth, as an organ of prehension, as the canine tooth of a dog, or the tusk of a bear or an elephant.

Since I am a dog, beware my fangs. Shak., M. of V., iii, 3.

Some creatures have overlong or outgrowing teeth, which we call fangs or tusks.

Bacon, Nat. Hist.

(d) The socketted part of a tooth, as that by which the tooth holds on to the jaw. There may be one or several fangs.

Occasionally the second molar becomes so eroded, through absorption of its posterior fang by the pressure of the wisdom-tooth, as to cause inflammation of the pulp.

Quain, Med. Dict.

(e) The poison- or venom-tooth of a serpent, through which venom is injected into a wound made by it. See venom, and cut under poison-fang.

The fangs are longer, more curved, more movable, and more formidable in viperine than in colubrine snakes.

Quain, Med. Dict.

(f) The pointed and curved second joint of the faly or chelicera of a spider, pierced at the tip by the opening of the poison-duct. The term is sometimes applied to the whole chelicera. See cuts under chelicera and palp.

Whilst the fangs of one section of spiders move laterally, those of the Mygalidae move vertically.

Quain, Med. Dict.

(g) The tang of a tool. (h) Any projecting prong in a lock or a bolt.

The same word appears in gonfalon, gonfalon; see gonfalon.] 1. An ensign; a banner.—2. One of the tails of the forked pennon. See pennon.—3. Eccl.: (a) The cloth in which the deacon in the ancient or early medieval church received the oblations; the cloth with which the subdeacon or acolyte held the holy vessels; the offertorium, sindon, or offertory-veil. See patenier. (b) The cloth or offertorium in which a lay person brought bread for the offertory. (c) A napkin or cloth held in the deacon's hand or hung over his arm; a napkin or handkerchief used by the priest or celebrant at mass; a manipula or manipule. Fanon is a frequent name for maniple from the ninth to the sixteenth century. (d) A cloth or veil formerly worn on the neck and shoulders, or on the head also, by a celebrant at the eucharist; the amice in its older form. The Syro-Jacobites still use an ornament of this kind. (e) A similar veil or hood formerly worn in the Western Church by a prelate under his crown or miter; the head-dress or veil, formerly called orale, and still worn by the pope at solemn pontifical celebrations. This is an oblong piece of white silk gauze, ornamented with gold, blue, and red stripes. It is first put upon the head like a hood, descending on the shoulders. After assumption of the chasuble, it is thrown back, and rests upon the upper part of that vestment. (f) One of the lap-pets, pendants, or infule of a miter. They are apparently derived from or formed a part of the veil or hood once worn by prelates.

Take from your true subjects the Pope's false Christ with his bells and babblings, with his miters and masticies, with his fannons (read fannons) and fopperies, and let them have freely the true Christ again.

Ep. Bale, English Votaries, Pref.

(g) A church banner or vexillum. Also fannul.—4. In surg., a splint formerly used in fractures of the thigh and leg, consisting of a cylinder of straw, usually laid round a stick bound by cord or ribbon. Under it, next to the limb, was placed the false fanon, a compress of linen in many folds.

Rom. of Parthenay (E. E. T. S.), Pref., p. xiii.

A thousand fantasies

Begin to throng into my memory,

Of calling shapes, and beckoning shadows dire,

And airy tongues that syllable men's names.

Milton, Comus, l. 205.

It was a corpse in its burial clothes. Suddenly the fixed features seemed to move with dark emotion. Strange fantasy! It was but the shadow of the fringed curtain.

Hawthorne, The White Old Maid.

There are thousands of usually intelligent citizens who have decided that a Pacific railroad is a . . . fantasy of demagogues and visionaries.

H. Greeley, Overland Journey, xxiv.

5. In music, same as fantasia. = Syn. Fantasy, Fancy. See imagination. The present differentiation in meaning of the word fantasy from its contracted form fancy (heretofore overlooked by lexicographers), identical with that between the correlative adjectives fantastic and fanciful, is well illustrated in the following extracts:

Ye woods! that wave o'er Avon's rocky steep,

To Fancy's ear sweet is your murmuring deep! . . .

Alas vain Phantasies! the fleeting brood

Of Woe self-solaced in her dreamy wood!

Coleridge, Death of Chatterton.

From first to last, the processes of phantasy have been at work; but where the savage could see phantasms, the civilized man has come to amuse himself with fancies.

E. B. Tylor, Prim. Culture, I. 284.

The cold and mysterious power of the classic architect (in a building described) is wedded to the rich and libertine fancy of the Renaissance, treading unrestrained and unabashed the maze of nature and of phantasy.

Bard, And being fapt, sir, was, as they say, cashiered.

Shak., M. W. of W., i. 1.

fapesmo (fa-pes'mō), n. In logic, an indirect mood of the first figure of syllogism; one of the mnemonic words supposed to have been invented by Petrus Hispanus in the thirteenth century, and given in the "Summulae Logicales" of that author. Every letter in it is significant: the f means that the syllogism is to be reduced to ferio; the a, that the major premise is universal affirmative; the p, that that premise is to be converted per accidens in the reduction; the e, that the minor premise is universal negative; the s, that that premise is to be converted simply; the m, that the two premises are to be transposed in the reduction; and the o, that the conclusion is particular negative. The following is an example of fapesmo: All viviparous marine animals have fins; no fishes are viviparous marine animals; therefore, some animals that have fins are not fishes. Fapesmo, when considered as belonging to the fourth figure, is called fapes. The rare word fapesmo is another name for the mood fapt a.

young of swine, or a litter of pigs. [Local, far-about¹ (fär'a-bout'), n. A going far out of the way; used literally or figuratively.
Eng.]

What need these *far-about*s? Fuller, Holy War, p. 20.
farad (far'ad), n. [So called in honor of the chemist Michael Faraday (1791-1867). Cf. am-per, ohm, volt.] The electromagnetic unit of capacity of electricity. It is the capacity of a conductor which when charged with a difference of potential of one volt has a charge of one coulomb. In practice the microfarad, the thousandth of a farad, is more conveniently employed. The latter is the capacity of about three miles of an ocean cable.

Faradaic (far'a-da'ik), a. [Faraday + -ic; see faradism.] 1. Pertaining to Faraday, the English physicist.—2. [f. c.] Pertaining to the phenomena of electricity especially investigated by Faraday—for example, the phenomenon of induction. See faradic.

Tupper states that Faradaic irritation causes movements of the eyeballs and other movements indicative of vertigo.

Engel, Brit., XIX. 38.

Tetanus produced by faradaic electricity is not of the nature of an apparently single and prolonged contraction.

trast to a direct one.

faradism (far'a-dä-izm), n. [Faraday (see farad) + -ism.] Same as faradization.

faradic (fa-rad'ik), a. [Farad + -ic.] Pertaining to induced electric currents obtained from a variety of machines—some of them magneto-electric, composed of a revolving magnet and coils of wires, others of a coil (giving a galvanic current) and coils. The faradic machine now in common medical use is a form of induction coil consisting of a primary coil through which a current is sent from a voltaic cell, and a secondary coil surrounding the primary, in which brief but intense currents are induced in alternating directions by the automatic making and breaking of the primary current. See induction and induction-coil.

faradism (far'a-dizim), n. [Farad + -ism.] The form of electricity furnished by a faradic machine.

faradization (far'a-di-zä'shon), n. [Faradize
+ -ation.] In physiol., the stimulation of a nerve with induced currents of electricity.

faradize (far'a-diz), v. t.; pret. and pp. farad-ized, ppr. faradizing. [Faradize + -ize.] To stimulate, as a muscle, with induced electric currents.

Muscles which were previously sluggish, after being thoroughly kneaded, would contract far more readily when faradized.

faradizer (far'a-dī-zēr), n. An instrument employed in faradization.

farallon (fa-ral-yōn'), n.; pl. farallones (-yōnz' or, in Sp. manner, -yō'nes). [Sp.] A lofty rocky islet rising precipitously from the sea.
Generally used in the plural, because such islets frequently occur in groups; and there are several such groups on the American coast bearing this name. That best known is the one called the Farallones, in the Pacific, about 35 miles west of San Francisco.

Farancia (fa-ran'si-ä), n. [NL. (J. E. Gray, 1842); prob. a nonsense-name.] A genus of innocuous serpents, of the family Colubridæ and subfamily Calamariinæ. F. abacura is a common species in the southern United States, of a deep-red

farce¹ (färs), n. [= G. Dan. farce = Sw. fars, < F. farce, stuffing, a farce (> Sp. It. farsa = Pg. farça, a farce), < farcer, stuff; see farce¹, v.]

1. A secular dramatic composition of a ludic- rous or satirical character; low comedy. Originally the name (farsia) was applied to a canticle in a mixture of Latin and French, sung in many churches at the principal festivals, especially on Christmas. The modern farce is: (a) A dramatic composition of a broadly comic character, differing from other comedy chiefly in the grotesqueness and exaggeration of its characters and incidents. (b) An opera in one act, of an absurd, extravagant, or ludicrous character.

Comsall finds it necessary and expedient that the little farsche and play made by William Lauder be played at the Queen's Grace. Quoted in Lauder's Dewtie of Kynge (E. E. T. S.), Pref., [p. vi.]

Farce is that in poetry which grotesque is in a picture; the persons and actions of a farce are all unnatural, and the manners false. Dryden, Parallel of Poetry and Painting.

My notion of a farce is a short piece in one act, contain- ing a single comic idea, of course considerably expanded, but without anything that can really be called a plot. N. and Q., 7th ser., VI, 129.

The Egyptians are often amused by players of low and ridiculous farces, who are called Mohabbazeen. E. W. Lane, Modern Egyptians, II, 111.

2. Ridiculous parade; absurd pageantry; fool- ish show.

Let her see

That all this mingled Mass which she,

Being forbidden, longs to know,

Is a dull farce and empty show.

Pope, An English Padlock.

For Swift and him [Parnell], [thou hast] despised the farce of state,

The sober follies of the wise and great.

Pope, Epistle to Earl of Oxford.

3. A ridiculous sham.

far-forth (fär'föth'), adv. [Also as two words, far forth; early mod. E. also far forth; < ME.

1. Far on; far forward; in an advanced degree or extent.

Now be we so far-forth come,
Speke mote we of the donee,
M.S. Laud, 416, l. 116. (Halliwell.)

Ne none agayne so farre-forthe in her fauour
That is full satisfied with her behauour.

Sir T. More, To Them that Seke Fortune.
He sayd not such words, nor spake so far-forth in the matter, without commission. Hakluyt's Voyages, II, 55.
So long these knights discoursed diuersly
Of strange affaires, and noble hardiment, . . .
That now the humid night was far-forth spent.
Spenser, F. Q., III, ix, 53.

2. Far; to or in such a degree or extent; in the adverbial conjunctive phrases as, or so, far-forth as, where the words are now usually separated, forth being expletive.

Vousre bak eke in no way
Turne on no white, as far-forth as ye may.
Babees Book (E. E. T. S.), p. 4.

He is descendid of an high lenage,
And as far-forth as I canne fele and see,
He waytith after right grete heritage.
Generiques (E. E. T. S.), l. 2439.

So far-forth as those writers which are come to our

farin (far'in), n. [< F. farine, < L. farina: see farina.] Same as farina.

farina (fa-ré'ñā or -rī'nā), n. [= F. farine = Pr. Sp. It. farina = Pg. farinha, < L. farina, ground corn, meal, flour, < far (farr-), a sort of grain, spelt, also coarse meal, grits, = AS. here, *E. hear*³, barley; see *hear*³, *barley*¹.] 1. In a general sense, meal or flour. Specifically—2. A soft, tasteless, and commonly white flour, obtained by trituration of the seeds of cereal and leguminous plants, and of some roots, as the potato. It consists of gluten, starch, and mucilage.—3. A preparation of white maize in granular form, coarser than meal, but finer than hominy. It is used for puddings, etc. [U. S.].—4. In bot., the pollen of flowers.

This is divided into many cells which contain a great number of small seeds covered with a red farina.
Granger, The Sugar-Cane, iv., note.

5. In entom., a mealy powder found on some insects. See farinose, 3.—Fossil farina, a variety of calcium carbonate, in thin white crusts, light as cotton, and easily reducible to powder.

farina-boiler (fa-ré'ñā-boi'lér), n. A saucepan or kettle used for cooking farinaceous articles, or any delicate food liable to scorch. It consists of two vessels, the outer one for water, and the inner one for the article to be cooked. [U. S.] farinaceous (far-i-nā'shi-us), a. [= Sp. farináceo = It. farinaceo, < LL. farinaceus, < farina, meal; see farina.] 1. Consisting or made of meal or flour; as, a farinaceous diet, which consists of articles prepared from the meal or flour of the various species of corn or grain.

When one huge wooden bowl before them stood,
Fill'd with huge balls of farinaceous food.
Crabbe, Works, IV, 154.

2. Containing starch; as, farinaceous seeds.—3. Pertaining to meal; of the nature of meal; mealy; as, a farinaceous taste or quality.—4. Having a mealy appearance; covered with or as if with meal; characterized by something resembling meal; applied in pathology to certain eruptions in which the epidermis exfoliates in fine scales resembling farina.

Some fly with two wings, as birds and many insects; some with four, as all farinaceous or mealy-winged animals, as butter-flies and moths.

Sir T. Browne, Vulg. Err., iii, 15.

farinaceously (far-i-nā'shi-us-li), adv. With farina; as, farinaceously tomentose.

It is often produced in such quantities as to hide the surface, and project in long masses or filaments, which fall off at the least touch. (b) Covered with the matter described above, as the abdomens of certain leaf-hoppers. (c) Covered with minute dots resembling white or yellow powder, or with a fixed whitish powder on a dark surface, as spots on the elytra of certain beetles. Also farinulenta.

farinulent (fa-rin'ū-lent), a. [< farina + -ulent.] Same as farinose, 3.

farkleberry (fär'kl-ber'i), n. The Vaccinium arboreum, a shrub or small tree of the southern United States, bearing a small, black, many-seeded berry, with a dry and rather astringent pulp. The wood is hard and very close-grained, and is used to some extent in turning.

farl¹ (färl), v. t. [*A contr. of fardle, fardl*¹, pack up; corruptly fardle, contr. furl, the present form; see furl.] To furl.

Hey-day, hey-day, how she kicks and yerks!
Down with the main mast! lay her at hull!
Furl up all her linnens, and let her ride it out!

Fletcher (and another), Sea Voyage, i, l.

farl² (färl), n. [*See, a contr. of fardle*², *fardle*², lit. a fourth part; see *fardle*². For the contraction, cf. *farl*¹.] A quarter or third part of a thin circular cake of flour or oatmeal. Also farrel.

O'er a weel-tostit grille farle.

Ferguson, Poems, II, 78.

farleu (fär'lö), n. In Scots law, money paid by tenants in lieu of a heriot; often applied to the best chattel, as distinguished from heriot, the best beast.

farlie, farly, a., n., and adv. See ferly.

farm¹ (färm), n. [Early mod. E. also farme, ferme; < ME. ferme, rent, revenue, particularly as collected by a 'farmer,' factor, or steward, hence also stewardship; also a meal, a feast; < AS. feorm (fem., gen. acc. etc., feorme), provision, food, supplies; provisions, etc., supplied by a vassal or tenant to his lord, esp. to the king; hence an estate from which such supplies are due (cyninges feorm, late AS. cynges feorne-hām, 'king's farm'); hence also a meal, a feast, and, generally, entertainment (of a guest or, as a tenant's duty, of his lord), harboring (of a fugitive); also, rarely, use, advantage (> feormian, ge-feormian, supply with food, sustain, entertain, receive (a guest), harbor (a fugitive), etc., > feormere, a purveyor (of a guild), feormung, and fyrneth, a harboring (of fugitives), etc.); orig. perhaps 'a living, means of subsistence,' connected with feorh, life, = OS. ferah, ferh = OHG. ferah, ferh, MHG. verch = lecl. fjör, life, = Goth. fairhwas, the world. But as AS. feorm is always rendered in ML. by firma or ferma, which is formally identical with the fem. of L. firmus, ML. often spelled fermus (> OF. ferme, ME. ferme, > mod. E., with restored L. vowel, firma), most writers have assumed the actual identity of the two words (L. firma, fem. adj., and ML. firma or ferma, n.), "either because the farms were at first inclosed or fortified with walls, or because the leases were confirmed or made more certain by signature": see firma, a., firm, v., firm, n. But the AS. form appears to be the original. The ML. firma, firma has the AS. senses, and, later, the senses of rent, revenue, particularly as collected by a farmer or factor, also in general a tax, tribute, impost. Hence OF. ferme, F. ferme = Pr. ferme, in same senses, the OF. being partly the source of the ME. form. The mixture of forms and senses has confused the history of the word. The purely agricultural sense is comparatively modern.] 1. In old English use, the revenue or rent from lands under lease; revenue, rent, or income in general, but originally chiefly in the form of natural products.

He . . . gaf a certeyn ferme for the graunt.

Chaucer, Gen. Prolog. to C. T. (ed. Tyrwhitt), l. 253.

Ferms thyk are comyng, my purs is bot wake.
Towneley Mysteries, p. 84.

The impost continued to be levied, and was included, with the imposts upon wines, in the farm termed 'the petty farm.'

S. Dowell, Taxes in England, l. 216.

The profits of the King's land in the shire, his various dues and rights in kind and in money, were commuted for a fixed sum, the farm of the shire.

E. A. Freeman, Norman Conquest, V, 294.

2. The state of land leased on rent reserved; a lease; possession under lease; as, in law, to farm let, or let to farm.

He sette hys tounes and hys lordes to ferme.

Spenser, State of Ireland.

3. The system, method, or act of collecting revenue by letting out a territory in districts.

Under an ordinance of September 20, 1649, the commissioners had power to let out to farm the excise upon all or any commodities. S. Dowell, Taxes in England, II, 19.

The first farm of postal income was made in 1672, and by farmers it was administered until June, 1790.

Encyc. Brit., XIX, 580.

4. A country or district let out for the collection of revenue. [Rare.]

The province was divided into twelve farmes. Lucke.

5. A tract of land devoted to general or special cultivation under a single control, whether that of its owner or of a tenant; as, a small farm; a wheat-, fruit-, dairy-, or market-farm.

Cato would have this point especially to be considered, that the soil of a farme (situate as hath been said) be good of itself, and fertile. Halland, tr. of Pliny, xvii, 3.

At my farm,

I have a hundred milch kine to the pail.

Shak., T. of the 8, ii, 1.

Then the great Hall was wholly broken down,
And the broad woodland parcel'd into farmes.
Templeton, Aymer's Field.

6†. A farm-house; a grange; a granary.

As for example: farmes or granges which containe chambers in them, more than fiftie cubits in length.

Hakluyt's Voyages, I, 577.

7†. A dwelling; a habitation; a lodging.

His sinfull sowle with desperate disdain

Out of her fleshy ferme fled to the place of paine.

Spenser, F. Q., III, v, 23.

Blanch farm. See blanch farm. Home farm. (a) The farm on an English manor not held by tenants, but reserved for the immediate use of the lord. (b) A farm or portion of a farm nearest to or surrounding the home.

To farm let. See def. 2.

farm¹ (färm), v. [< ME. fermen, take on lease, < ferme, n.; see *farm*¹, n.] I. trans. 1. To lease, as land, at a stated rent; give a lease of, as land; let to a tenant on condition of paying rent; as, to farm a manor.

We go to gain a little patch of ground

That hath in it no profit but the name.

To pay tve ducats, five, I would not farm it.

Shak., Hamlet, iv, 1.

Specifically—2. To lease or let (taxes, imposts, or other duties) for a term at a stated rental; generally with out. It was formerly customary in some European countries, and is still in some eastern ones, for the ruler or government to farm the revenues (taxes or rents, imposts, and excise) to individuals for a certain percentage on the amount collected, or for the payment of fixed sums, the farmers of the revenue retaining the surplus of their collections.

But I believe he [the king] must farm out your Warwickshire benevolence for the payment thereof.

Doane, Letters, i.

The farming out of the defence of a country, being wholly unprecedented and evidently abused, could have no real object but to enrich the contractor at the Company's expense. Burke, Charge against Warren Hastings.

The older sources of income were, according to the later use of an ancient English word, farmed by the sheriff.

E. A. Freeman, Norman Conquest, V, 294.

3. To take at a certain rent or rate; take a lease of; pay a stated sum or percentage for the use, collection, etc., of.

The Jewes farme the Custome of the Kings.

farm-building (färm' bīl dīng), n. One of the buildings belonging to and used for the business of a farm.

farmer (fär'mēr), n. [*< ME. fermar, fermour, a steward, bailiff, collector of taxes, partly < OF. fermier, F. fermier, a farmer, a lessee, also a chief husbandman, a bailiff or overseer of a farm (< ML. fermarius, one to whom land is rented for a term of years, a collector of taxes, a deputy. < firma, farm, in its various senses: see farm), partly < AS. færmere, a purveyor (of a guild). < færmian, purvey, supply, etc.: see farm¹, n. and v.] 1. One who undertakes the collection of taxes, customs, excise, or other duties for a certain rate per cent., or pays a fixed sum for the privilege of collecting and retaining them; as, a farmer of the revenues.

S. Donnell, Taxes in England, II, 43.

The equites also formed the public revenues. Those who were engaged in this business were called publicani; and, though Cicero, who was himself of the equestrian order, speaks of these farmers as "the flower of the Roman equites, the ornament of the state, the safeguard of the republic," it appears that they were a set of detestable oppressors.

Anthony's Classical Dict.

2. In mining, the lord of the field, or one who farms the lot and cope of the crown. [Eng.]

3. One who cultivates a farm, either as owner or lessee; in general, one who tills the soil.

Here's a farmer, that hanged himself on the expectation of plenty.

Shak., Macbeth, II, 3.

O why are farmers made so coarse,

Or clergy made so fine?

Comper, The Yearly Distress.

You did but come as goblins in the night, . . .

Nor robbed the farmers of his bowl of cream.

Tennyson, Princess, v.

We are thus led to believe that the English farmers were at first joint owners of all the arable land as well as of the pastures and waste grounds in the township.

C. Elton, Origins of Eng. Hist., p. 406.

4. The eldest son of the holder or occupier of a farm; anciently, a yeoman or country gentleman. [Prov. Eng.] Farmer's satin. See satin.

farmeress (fär'mēr-es), n. [< farmer + -ess.] A woman who farms; a farmer's wife. [Rare.]

Went to Margate; and the following day was carried to see a gallant widow, brought up a farmeress, and I think of gigantic race, rich, comely, and exceedingly industrious.

Fielding, Memoirs, May 19, 1672.

farmer-general (fär'mēr-jen'g-rāl), n. In France, under the old monarchy, a member of a privileged class which farmed certain branches of the revenue—that is, contracted with the government to pay into the treasury a fixed yearly sum, taking upon itself the collection and use of certain taxes as an equivalent. This system was intolerably oppressive, especially in the eighteenth century, when its members were united in an association. It was swept away at the revolution, and about thirty farmers-general were executed in 1794.

farmership (fär'mēr-shīp), n. [< farmer + -ship.] The state or occupation of a farmer; management of a farm.

farntickle, n. See franticle.

faro (fä'ro), n. [Also written pharao, pharaon, after F. pharaon; said to be named from a figure formerly on one of the cards, representing Pharaoh, King of Egypt.] A game played by betting on the order in which certain playing-cards (with reference simply to face-value) will appear when taken singly from the top of the pack.

The players sit at one side of a table, and the dealer at the other. The dealer always represents the bank, having in charge the paying and claiming of bets. In the United States the table has on its center the "pay-out" or representation of thirteen cards, from the ace up to the king, in regular order. After bets have been placed on single cards or combinations, the dealer removes the top card from a complete pack placed face up in a box, which card does not count; he then withdraws the next one, leaving the third exposed, and claims all bets made on the card equal in value to the one withdrawn and pays those made on the other; the appearance together of two cards of the same value is called a "split," and the better loses half of his stake. Any bet may be "cropped" by playing a button on top of the money or checks, and this changes the bet to one that the card will show for the dealer.

The showing of two cards constitutes a "turn," and after each turn new bets are made for another, down to the last three cards of the pack; the only betting allowed after this is on "calling the turn," or guessing which will show first. The European game is essentially the same, except that the layout is arranged in a small book.

Then he dashes into the vortex of Paris, where it is said that he introduced the game called faro, and became still more conspicuous than at Brussels by his enormous gains at the gaming table. Gauguin, Hist. Louisiana, I, 198.

farrow¹ (fär'ō), n. [Also dial. farry, fure, far, litter of pigs (a sense appar. developed from the pl. of the orig. noun, which meant 'a little pig,' or perhaps from the verb farrow, as if 'a farrowing,' hence 'the pigs farrowed': see the verb), *< ME. farh, found only in pl. farren, < AS. fearh (also ferh, ferh), pl. fearas (only in glosses), a pig, a little pig = D. varken, a pig (dim. of vark; see aardvark), = OHG. farh, farah, MHG. varch, G. dial. farch, dim. OHG. farhelt, MHG. verhel, a pig, G. ferkel = Sw. far (-galt), a boar, = L. porcus (Gr. πῶρος, appar. from L.), > E. pork, q. v. = Old. ore = Lith. paršas = OBulg. prase = Russ. porosia, a pig. Cf. AS. fōr, fōr (in glosses), a little pig, tr. L. porcellus.] 1. A little pig.

Pour in sow's blood, that hath eaten

Her nine farrow. Shak., Macbeth, iv, 1.

2. A litter of pigs.

farrow¹ (fär'ō), v. t. [= Se. ferry, < ME. ferren, furgen, pp. geryged, gyrreued (late North. ferrygit), farrow, *< farh, pl. farren, a little pig; see farrow¹, n.] To bring forth, as pigs: said only of swine.

There were three sucking pigs serv'd vp in a dish,

Ta'en from the sow as soon as farrowed.

Mussinger, City Madam, ii, 1.

farrow² (fär'ō), a. [Always in reference to a cow, and prob. first in phrase farrow cow; usually connected with D. varckoe, also simply vaars, a heifer, in OD. vers-kalf, verse, varse = MHG. verse, G. färs, a heifer, a fem. corresponding to a male form, D. var, varre, a bullock, = OHG. far, farro, MHG. var, varre, G. farre = Icel. farri, a bullock, = AS. fearr, a bull. The AS. word is not found later, and can hardly be the source of farrow; it would have produced *ME. ferr, mod. *E. far.] Not producing young in a particular season or year: applied to cows only. If a cow has had a calf, but fails in a subsequent year, she is said to be farrow or to go farrow.

Wt' good white bread, and farrow-cow milk,

He bade her feed me aft.

Lord Randal (A) (Child's Ballads, II, 24).

I wou'd feed ye with the ferra cow's milk, . . .

An' dress ye i' the finest silk.

The Minister's Daughter o' Newark (Child's Ballads, II, 37).

farry (fär'i), n. A dialectal variant of farrow¹. farser (färs), n. [< ML. farsa, prop. fem. of farsus, pp. of L. farcire, stuff, fill up; see farcel¹.] In some English churches before the reformation, a paraphrase or explanation of the Latin epistle in the vernacular tongue, read or sung for the benefit of the people immediately after the epistle.

Then follows the lesson from the Epistle of St. Paul to Titus, and then the farse proceeds, "St. Paul sent this ditty," etc.

Dr. Burney, Hist. Music, II, 256.

farset (färs), v. t. [Same as farcel¹, v.] Eccles., to extend by interpolation, as a part of the prescribed service: a frequent practice in the middle ages. Thus, the Gloria in Excelsis was sometimes farsed by interpolations in honor of the Virgin Mary.

far-seeing (fär'sē'ing), a. Seeing far; having foresight or forethought.

There was no Wolsey now, with a European policy, sagacious, farseeing, and patriotic.

Athenæum, No. 3147, p. 209.

To the northwest our farthest was Chawonek from Roanoke 130 miles.

Quoted in Capt. John Smith's True Travels, I, 57.

farthest (fär'thest), adv. superl. Same as farthest¹.

farthing (fär'thing), n. [Formerly also, and still dial., farding; < ME. fərthing, fərthinge, < AS. frārthing, ONorth. frārthing (= Icel. fjörð-ung = ODan. fjerdung, Dan. Sw. fjerdung, a fourth part of a thing), earlier AS. frārthing, a fourth of a penny ("feorhtling of the feorþra dæl thinges, quadrans," lit. a 'fourthling' or fourth part of a thing), < feartha, fourth, + dim. -ing, -ling.] 1. An English piece of money equal to one fourth of a penny; the smallest English coin and money of account. The old silver penny was deeply impressed with a cross and being broken made four farthings. Later silver farthings were coined; the first copper farthings were issued by Charles II, and they are now made of bronze.

Obverse. Reverse.
Farthing of Charles II, 1662. British Museum. Size of the original.

If thou gene for my love a ferthinge,

Thou dost it with an heuy harte.

Political Poems, etc. (ed. Furnivall), p. 177.

Aye, and tell me the monie on my cloak lap:

For there's no ae fardun I'll trust thee.

Dick o' the Cow (Child's Ballads, VI, 79).

Now for the partes of Coyne or money, the least in name is a farthing, but there are none extant in coyne at this day to my knowledge.

T. Hill, Antiquities (1690), i, 138.

After all this he calls for satisfaction, when as he himselfe hath already taken the utmost farthin.

Milton, Apology for Smectymmhus.

Our churchwardens

Feed on the silver, and give us the farthings. Gau.

2t. A division of land, probably originally a fourth of a hide; later, a quarter of an acre.

Thirty acres make a farthing-land; nine farthings a Cornish acre; and four Cornish acres a knight's fee.

R. Camo, Survey of Cornwall.

The farthings (fjörðungar) of Norway and Iceland were territorial districts the "quarters" of some larger area. In Norway they were quarters of the "fylki" which answer to the "folks" which we have in our shires—namely Norfolk and Suffolk. In Iceland the farthings correspond more nearly to our parishes, each having its farthing-kirk, or parish-church; its farthing-thing, or parish vestry; and its farthing-doom, or court-leet.

The sixth fasciculus of Dr. Fisher's Manuel de Conchyliologie has appeared.

Science, III, 54.

Specifically.—2. In anat., a bundle; a set of something, as fibers, banded or bundled together. Specifically (a) One of the bundles of nervous tissue composing the spinal cord; one of the pillars of the cord or medulla oblongata. (b) A bundle of muscular fibers.

A small bundle of muscular fibers separated from similar bundles by the endosomium, and when bound together by the perimyosium with other fasciculi forming the muscle.

Quain, Anat., I, 186.

3. A nosegay.—Arcuate fasciculus. See arcuate.—Fasciculi graciles, the slender fascicles lying on either side of the posterior median fissure of the spinal cord, terminating in the clavae of the medulla oblongata. Fasciculi teretes, the round fascicles, a pair of bundles of nerve-tissue in the floor of the fourth ventricle of the brain, lying parallel with each other alongside the median line, being the upward continuation of the trigonum hypoglossi on either side. Also called fasciculi teretes and eminentia teretes.—Fasciculus uncinatus, fasciculus unciniformis, the hooked fascicle, a bundle of white fibers in the fissure of Sylvius, connecting the frontal and temporal lobes of the cerebrum.—Olfactory fasciculus, a bundle of nerve-fibers behind the olivary body of the medulla oblongata and continuous with the lateral column of the spinal cord.

fascinate (fas'-i-nāt), v.; pret. and pp. fascinated, ppr. fascinating. [L. fascinatus, pp. of fascinare (> It. af-fascinare = Sp. Pg. fascinar = F. fasciner), enchant, bewitch, charm (by the eyes or tongue); cf. fascinum, fascinum, a bewitching, witchcraft. The resemblance to Gr. βασκαίνω, slander, malign, disparage, grudge, envy, later bewitch (by means of spells, an evil eye, etc.), βασκαρός, slander, envy, malice, later sorcery, witchcraft, is imperfect, and appears to be accidental.] I. trans. 1. To bewitch; act on by witchcraft or by some analogous powerful or irresistible influence; hence, to influence the imagination, reason, or will of in an uncontrollable manner. See fascination.

It has been almost universally believed that . . . serpents can stupefy and fascinate the prey which they are desirous to obtain.

E. Griffith, tr. of Cuvier.

James, while his fate was under discussion, remained at Whitehall, fascinated, as it seemed, by the greatness and nearness of the danger, and unequal to the exertion of either struggling or flying.

Macaulay, Hist. Eng., x.

2. To enchant; captivate; excite the passions or affections of, and allure powerfully or irresistibly.

His [Essex's] mind, ardent, susceptible, . . . was fascinated by the genius and accomplishments of Bacon.

Macaulay, Lord Bacon.

= Syn. Charm, etc. (see enchant); to throw or bring under a spell, hold spell-bound, entrance, encharm.

II. intrans. To exercise a bewitching or captivating power.

None of the affections . . . have been noted to fascinate or bewitch, but love and envy.

Bacon, Envy.

The richness and vigour of the Mahadeo temple redeems its want of elegance, and fascinate in spite of its somewhat confused outline.

J. Ferguson, Hist. Indian Arch., p. 456.

fascinating (fas'-i-nā-ting), p. a. Bewitching; enchanting; charming; captivating; as, a most fascinating poem.

But when his tender strength in time shall rise fascinatingly (fas'-i-nā-ting-lĭ), adv. In a fascinating manner; alluringly; charmingly.

fascination (fas-i-nā'-shon), n. [= F. fascinatio = Sp. fascinacion = Pg. fascinação = It. fascinazione, af-fascinazione, < L. fascinatō (-n-), an enchanting, a bewitching, < fascinare, enchant, bewitch; see fascinate.] 1. The act of bewitching; enchantment; hence, a subtle, irresistible influence upon the imagination, reason, or will. It was formerly generally believed, and still is believed by uneducated and barbarous people, that certain persons have the power of inflicting various diseases and evils on individuals by using certain words or spells, or by a look, without coming in contact with them or administering anything to them; against this fascination divers medicines, amulets, and ceremonies have been used. (See captation, 2.) The notion of the "evil eye," which still exists, is a vestige of this superstition. (See the evil eye, under evil.) Of the lower animals fascination, as a power exerted or as an effect, has been almost universally attributed to venomous reptiles, as the rattlesnake or the cobra, with much evidence in its favor upon the face of observed incidents, but as yet without satisfactory scientific determination.

Fascination is the power and act of imagination, intense upon other bodies than the body of the imaginer.

Bacon, Advancement of Learning, ii, 204.

The Turks hang old rascals . . . on their fairest horses, . . . to secure them against fascination.

Waller.

2. A fascinating influence upon the passions and affections; a powerful attraction; a spell; a charm; as, the fascinations of society.

The gift of fascination, the power to charm when, where, and whom she would.

Charlotte Brontë, Shirley, ix.

Speculative minds cannot resist the fascination of metaphysics, even when forced to admit that its inquiries are hopeless.

G. H. Lewes, Probs. of Life and Mind, Int., I, i, § 6.

Her face had a wonderful fascination in it.

Longfellow, Hyperion, p. 223.

3. The state of being fascinated or bewitched, or under the sway of a powerful attraction or a commanding and more or less mysterious influence; specifically, a certain hypnotic state. See the extract.

As an addition to the investigations of Charcot and Duport-pollier, Dr. Bremond, in 1884 made the discovery that there was a fourth hypnotic state, fascination, which preceded the three others, and manifested itself by a tendency to muscular contractions, as well as through sensibility to hallucination and suggestion, but at the same time left to the subject a full consciousness of his surroundings, and remembrance of what had taken place.

Science, IX, 544.

fascinator (fas'-i-nā-tor), n. [= F. fascinator, a. = Sp. Pg. fascinator, n. = It. fascinatore, < L. fascinare, fascinate; see fascinate.] One who or that which fascinates.

fascinatress (fas'-i-nā-tres), n. [= F. fascinatrix, a. fem. = It. fascinatrice, n.; as fascinator + -ess.] A woman who fascinates. [Rare.] "She's an enchantress, . . . a charmer, 'I said, 'a fascinatress."

H. James, Jr., Daisy Miller, p. 42.

fascine (fas-sen'), n. [F. fascine, OF. fascina, fascium = It. fascina, < L. fascina, a bundle of sticks, a fagot, < fascis, a bundle; see fascis.] 1. A fagot; specifically (mil. it.), a bundle of rods or small sticks of wood bound at both ends and in the middle, used in fortification, raising batteries, filling ditches, strengthening ramparts, and making parapets. Sometimes fascines dipped in melted pitch or tar are used to set fire to an enemy's lodgments or other works. In civil engineering fascines are used in the construction of sea and river walls to prevent the washing away of the shores, or to collect silt, mud, etc., to elevate the bottom and so form an island, as in Holland.

Where it was found impossible, orders were given to the horse of the second line of the allies to provide themselves,

The extra profit arises from the fact that the sale of pieces of work makes no distinction in this respect. To beat or ink fat, in printing, to overcolor (a form of types) with an excess of ink. To cut it too fat. See cut.

II. n. [= D. vet, G. fett, Sw. fett = Dan. fett, fat, n.; from the adj.] 1. A white or yellowish only solid substance forming the chief part of the adipose tissue of animals, and also found in plants. In chemistry the fats are colorless, tasteless, colorless or white bodies, which may be either solid or liquid. They are insoluble in water and cold alcohol, but dissolve freely in ether, chloroform, and benzene. The solid neutral fats, like permeate (suet), and lard, and the liquid non-volatile oils, like olive and olive oil, are fused together as fat. They are compound ethers formed by the union of fatty acids with the triatomic alcohol glycerol. They are composed of carbon, hydrogen, and oxygen, but contain no nitrogen. The most common and most useful are stearin, palmitin, and olein. Of these stearin and palmitin are solid at ordinary temperatures, and olein is liquid. Most animal and vegetable fats are mixtures of these three or of the simple fats and their hardness depends on the relative quantity of olein or other liquid fats in them. When a fat is treated with an alkali, the fat is saponified, with the alkali being made a soap, and the glycerol is freed. When a soap is treated with an acid, the fat is taken from the fatty acid which is thus set free.

The Indian Lard

Lovell, Among my Books, 1st ser., p. 363.

5†. Doomed; cursed.

From forth the fatal loins of these two foes

A pair of star-cross'd lovers take their life.

Shak., R. and J., Prolog.

fatalism (fā'tal-izm), n. [= D. G. fatalismus = Dan. fatalisme = Sw. fatalism, < F. fatalisme = Sp. Pg. It. fatalismo; as fatal + -ism.] 1. The doctrine that all things are subject to fate, or come or go by inevitable pre-determination. Fatalism is a doctrine which does not recognize the determination of all events by causes, in the ordinary sense; holding, on the contrary, that a certain foreordained result will come about, no matter what may be done to prevent it. Fatalism is thus directly opposed to neccessitarianism, according to which every event is determined by the events which immediately precede it, in a mechanical way. Neccessitarianism seems hardly to leave room for final causes, while fatalism is the doctrine that certain results are sure to come in spite of all that efficient causes may do to prevent them. See necessity.

To confute these three fatalisms, or false hypotheses of the system of the universe, Cudworth designed to dedicate three great works—one against atheism, another against immoral theism, and the third against the theism whose doctrine was the inevitable "necessity" which determined all actions and events, and deprived man of his free agency.

I. D'Israeli, Amen. of Lit., II. 398.

Necessity simply says that whatever is, and will vary with varying conditions. Fatalism says that something must be; and this something cannot be modified by any modification of the conditions.

G. H. Lewes, Probs. of Life and Mind, I. 309.

2. A disposition to regard everything as the result of or predetermined by fate; the acceptance of all conditions and events as inevitable.

It was vain to resist the wrath of God; and so a wretched fatalism bowed to a more utter prostration the cowed and spiritless race.

Milman, Latin Christianity, v. 9.

Not content with the overwhelming prestige which its name thus gives it, the free-will doctrine seeks to follow up its advantage by identifying its antagonist with Asiatic fatalism.

J. Fiske, Cosmic Philos., II. 185.

fatalist (fā'tal-ist), n. [= D. G. Dan. Sw. fatalist, < F. fataliste = Sp. Pg. It. fatalista; as fatal + -ist.] 1. A believer in fatalism; one who maintains the opinion that all things happen by inevitable pre-determination.

Fatalists, . . . such as hold the material necessity of things without a Deity, . . . that is indeed the atheists.

Cudworth.

The third sort of fatalists do not deny the moral attributes of the Deity, in his nature essentially benevolent and just.

I. D'Israeli, Amen. of Lit., II. 398.

2. One whose conduct is controlled by belief in fatalism; one who accepts all the events and conditions of life as proceeding from or leading to an inevitable fate: as, Orientals are naturally fatalists.

Giovanni comes upon the scene a professed and daring infidel, and, like all other infidels, a fatalist.

Gifford, Int. to Ford's Plays, p. xxxi.

To the confidence which the heroic fatalist (William of Orange) placed in his high destiny and in his sacred cause is to be partly attributed his singular indifference to danger.

Macaulay, Hist. Eng., vii.

fatalistic (fā-tal-ist'ik), a. [< fatalist + -ic.] Pertaining to fatalism; implying fatalism; savoring of fatalism.

Would you have me believe that the events of this world are fastened to a revolving cycle, with God at one end and the Devil at the other, and that the Devil is now uppermost? Are you a Christian, and talk about a crisis in that fatalistic sense?

Coleridge, Talde-Talk.

fatality (fā-tal'i-ti), n.: pl. fatalities (-tiz). [= D. fataliteit = G. fatalität = Dan. Sw. fatalitet, < F. fatalité = Sp. fatalidad = Pg. fatalidade = It. fatalità, < LL. fatalitas (-t-), fatal necessity, fatality, < L. fatalis, fatal: see fat¹.] 1. The quality of being fatal; fatality: as, the fatality of an event.—2. A fixed, unalterably pre-determined course of things, independent of any controlling cause; a doom which inevitably must be, whatever forces may oppose it; an invincible necessity existing in things themselves.

Think not to fasten thy imperfections on the stars, and so despairingly conceive thyself under a fatality of being evil.

Sir T. Browne, Christ. Mor., III. 7.

There is a fatality, a feeling so irresistible and inevitable that it has the force of doom.

Hawthorne, Scarlet Letter, v.

There must have been a sort of grim fatality steering me, and neutralizing all reflections likely to hold me back.

W. C. Russell, A Strange Voyage, II.

3. Tendency to destruction or danger, or to some hazardous, critical, or fatal event; mortality; deadliness.

Seven times nine, or the year sixty three, is conceived to carry up to the most considerable fatality.

The fatty compound of copper is produced when blue vitriol is mixed with a hot and strong solution of soap.
O'Neill, Dyeing and Calico Printing, p. 185.

The clay should be fatty and plastic.

C. T. Davis, Bricks and Tiles, p. 286.

Fatty acids, a class of monobasic acids formed by the oxidation of the primary alcohols. Formic and acetic acids are the simplest of the series. The more complex fatty acids are found in all oleaginous compounds, where they exist combined with glycerin, forming fats. When a fat is heated with a stronger base than glycerin, as potash or soda, the fatty acids leave the glycerin and combine with the metallic base, forming a soap. By treating the soap with a stronger acid, the fatty acids are displaced and set free. The most common of the complex fatty acids are oleic, stearic, and palmitic acids.—Fatty degeneration. See degeneration.—Fatty tissue. Same as adipose tissue (which see, under adipose).

fatuous (fā-tū'ī-tus), a. [< fatuity + -ous]. Characterized by fatuity; foolish; fatuous.

We cry aloud for new avenues and consumers for the productions of our industry, and at the same time decline, with a fatuous persistence, to take any step to obtain the one or to reach the other.

G. F. Edmunds, Harper's Mag., LXXVI. 432.

fatuity (fā-tū'ī-ti), n. [= F. fatuité = Pr. fatuitat = Sp. fatuidad = Pg. fatuidade = It. fatuità, < L. fatuita(-t)s, foolishness, < fatuus, foolish; see fatuous]. 1. Self-conceited foolishness; weakness of mind with high self-esteem; unconscious stupidity; also, as applied to things, springing from or exhibiting such traits.

The follies which Molière ridicules are those of affectation, not those of fatuity. Macaulay, Macchiavelli.

He still held to an impossible purpose with a tenacity which resembled fatuity. Motley, Dutch Republic, II. 336.

James II. attacked with a strange fatuity the very Church on whose teaching the monarchical enthusiasm mainly rested, and thus drove the most loyal of his subjects into violent opposition. Locky, Eng. in 18th Cent., i. 2.

Idiocy, or fatuity a nativitate, vel dementia naturalis, . . . one . . . who knows not to tell twenty shillings, nor knows his own age, or who was his father.

Sir M. Hale, Pleas of the Crown.

fatuous (fat'ū-us), a. [= Sp. Pg. It. fatuo, < L. fatuus, foolish, simple, silly, rarely insipid, tasteless (hence, through this sense, ult. faucet (fā'set), n. [E. dial. fusset (also fusset; see fusset); < ME. faucet, faucet, fawset, fauret, faucet, in both senses, < OF. fausset, also spelled fauzet, F. fausset, a faucet, < OF. fausser, pierce, strike or break through (a shield, armor, a troop, etc.), earlier fauzer, faiser, break, bend, and lit. make false, falsify, forge, < OF. fals, faus, false; see false, v. t.] 1. A device fixed in a receptacle or pipe to control the flow of liquid from it by opening or closing an orifice. A faucet of the original form is a hollow plug inserted in the head or side of a cask, with a transverse perforation in its projecting part for the reception of a solid peg or spigot, which is removed to permit the flow of liquid. Faucets are now made in a great variety of forms, commonly with the spigot or valve itself also perforated, to be turned by a handle or cock for opening or closing the orifice, but sometimes with valves otherwise constructed and controlled.

Thou was founde a fell [fierce, sharp] faucet.

In the tric [choice] time it was sette.

Holy Rood (E. E. T. S.), p. 211.

Stryke out the heed of your vessels; our men be to thryste to tarye tyll their drinke be drawn with a faucet.

Palsgrave, French Grammar, p. 740.

You see, marble bath, faucets for hot water and cold.

W. M. Baker, New Timothy, p. 169.

2. The enlarged end of a pipe fitted to the spigot-end of another pipe.—Self-closing faucet, a faucet of which the valve is secured to its seat by a spring to prevent the passage of the liquid, a lever lifting it when the liquid is to be drawn off.

R. Jonson, Poetaster, ii. 1.

2. A lack; a defect; an imperfection; a failing, blemish, or flaw; any lack or impairment of excellence: applied to things.

Patches, set upon a little breach,
Discredit more in hiding of the fault.
Shak., C. John, iv. 2.

But find you faithful friends that will improve,
That on your works may look with careful eyes,
And of your faults be zealous enemies,
Dryden, tr. of Boileau's Art of Poetry, l. 188.

Faults in your Person, or your Face, correct.
Congreve, tr. of Ovid's Art of Love.

Take, Madam, this poor book of song;
For tho' the faults were thick as dust
In vacant chambers, I could trust
Your kindness. Tennyson, To the Queen.

3. An error or defect of judgment or conduct; any deviation from prudence, rectitude, or duty; any shortcoming, or neglect of care or performance, resulting from inattention, incapacity, or perversity; a wrong tendency, course, or act.

Neither yet let any man curry faulch with him selfe after this wise; the faulch is but light, the law is broken in nothing but in this parte.
J. Cadell, On Jas., ii.

His [Calvin's] nature from a child observed by his own parents . . . was prone to sharp and severe reprehension where he thought any fault was.

Quoted in Hooker's Eccles. Polity, Pref., ii, note.

His [Bacon's] faults were — we write it with pain — coldness of heart and meanness of spirit.

Macauley, Lord Bacon.

To me
He is all fault who hath no fault at all.
Tennyson, Lancelot and Elaine.

4. An occasion of blame or censure; a particular cause for reprehension or disapproval; as, to charge one with a fault, or find fault with one.

Sleeping or waking, must I still prevail,
Or will you blame, and lay the fault on me?
Shak., 1 Hen. VI., ii. 1.

5. Blame; censure; reproach.

O, let me fly, before a prophet's fault,
Greene and Lodge, Looking Glass for Lord and Eng.

6. The act of losing the scent; a lost scent; said of sporting dogs.

Saw'st thou not, boy, how silver made it good
At the hedge corner, in the coldest fault?
I would not lose the dog for twenty pound.
Shak., T. of the S., Ind., i.

7. In geol., a severing of the continuity of a body of rock by a break through the mass, attended by movement on one side or the other of the break, so that what were once parts of one continuous stratum are now separated.

The amount of displacement of the strata thus occasioned may be a few inches or thousands of feet. Faults of a few feet are, however, the most common. Faults are occasioned by movements of the crust of the earth, and are a part of the complicated phenomena by which mountain chains are built up, and continents elevated and depressed. See slip, slide, break.

Along the flank of the Grampians a great fault runs from the North Sea at Stonehaven to the estuary of the Clyde, throwing the Old Red Sandstone on end and sometimes for a distance of two miles from the line of dislocation.

J. Croft, Climate and Cosmology, p. 293.

8. In tennis, a stroke by which the server fails to drive the ball into the proper part of his opponent's court. See lawn-tennis.

I would you had been at the tennis court, you should have seen me beat Monsieur Besan, and I gave him fifteen and all his faults.

Chapman, An Humorous Day's Mirth.

9. In teleq., a new path opened to a current by any accident; a derived current, or derivation.

In practice, derivations generally arise from the wire touching another conductor, such as the ground, a wet wall, a tree, or another wire. They are technically called faults.

R. S. Cathey, Pract. Teleq., p. 43.

At a fault, faulty; not as it ought to be; deficient. Nares. — At fault. (a) Open to censure; blamable; as, he is not at fault in the matter. (b) In hunting, thrown on the scent or the trail; unable to find the scent, as dogs. Hence — (c) Unable to proceed, by reason of some embarrassment or uncertainty; puzzled; out of bearing; astray.

The associationist theory is . . . entirely at fault.
Pope, Sci. Mo., XXXI, 608.

Reverse fault, in mining, a dislocation of the rocks by a fault of such a character that a part of the bed or vein faulted is brought under another part of the same vein. As a general rule, when a vein is heaved by a fault, the latter lies in the direction of the downthrow; this is a normal fault. When the heave is in the direction of the upthrow, the fault is said to be "reversed." To find fault, to discover, or perceive and make known, some defect, flaw, or matter of censure; find cause of blame, complaint, or reproach; absolute or followed by with, as, you are always finding fault; to find fault with fortune.

Thou wilt say then unto me, Why doth he yet find fault?
Rom. ix, 19.

Or can you fault with Pilots find
For changing Course, yet never blame the Wind?
Carley, The Mistress, Called Inconstant.

But who art thou, O man, that thus findest fault with thy Maker?
Stillington, Sermons, l. ii.

—Syn. 2. Flaw. 3. Misdeed, misdemeanor, transgression, wrong-doing, delinquency, weakness, slip, indiscretion.

So fares it with this faultful band of Rome, Shak., Lucresia, l. 715.

Her great heart thro' all the faultful Past Went sorrowing. Tennyson, Enoch, vii.

faultily (fālt'fī-lī), adv. In a faulty manner; defectively; imperfectly; wrongly.

Fenner an Englishman's book, which boasting and stately enough bore the title of Theologia Sacra, which, by stealth and very faultily, came out here first, was not long after printed again by them [of Geneva].

Whitgift, To Beza, in Styke's Whitgift, II, 166.

Faultily faultless, icily regular, splendidly null.
Tennyson, Maud, ii.

faultiness (fālt'fī-nes), n. The state of being faulty or imperfect; defect; error; badness; viciousness.

The present inhabitants of Geneva, I hope, will not take it in evil part that the faultiness of their people heretofore is by us so far forth laid open.

Hooker, Eccles. Polity, Pref., ii.

Cleo. Bear'st thou her face in mind? 'tis a long or round? Mess. Round even to faultiness. Shak., A. and C., iii. 3.

The majority of us scarcely see more distinctly the faultiness of our own conduct than the faultiness of our own arguments or the dullness of our own jokes.

George Eliot, Middlemarch, l. 206.

faulting (fālt'ing), n. [Verbal n. of fault, v.] In geol., the act or process of producing faults or dislocation of strata.

The persistent parallelism of the faults and of the prevailing northeasterly strike of the rocks indicates that the faulting and tilting were parts of one continuous process.

Amer. Jour. Sci. [3d ser.], XXIX, 15.

faultless (fālt'les), a. [< ME. faulth, faultless; < fault + -less.] Without fault; not defective or imperfect; free from blemish, flaw, or error; free from vice or offense; perfect in all respects; as, a faultless poem or picture.

So that no thing is faulty, but anon it's halfe benamend.

Macleod, Travels, p. 175.

The 13th. the Rais, having in the night remedied what was faulty in his vessel, set sail about seven o'clock in the morning.

Bence, Source of the Nile, l. 242.

The king's title was a cowardly faulty one; and the many conspiracies that had been formed had shown him the inability were not all of them disposed to bear his yoke.

Bence, Source of the Nile, II, 509.

His (Warren Hastings's) administration was indeed in many respects faulty; but the Bengalee standard of good government was not high. Maconslay, Warren Hastings.

2. Guilty of a fault or of faults; hence, to be blamed; deserving of or provoking censure.

From hence he passes to enquire wherefore I should blame the vices of the Prelate only, seeing the inferior clergy is known to be as faulty.

Milton, Apology for Smeectymnus.

He was a pretty, brisk, under-standing, industrious young gentleman, had formerly been faulty, but now much re-claimed.

Edw. in, Diary, May 30, 1694.

People who live at a distance are naturally less faulty than those immediately under our own eyes.

Green, Elst, Mill on the Floss, iii. 3.

=Syn. 1. Incomplete. — 2. Culpable, reprehensible, censurable, blame-worthy.

faun (fā'n), n. [ME. faun, < L. Faunus, in Rom. myth., the protecting deity of agriculture and of shepherds, in later times identified with Pan, and accordingly represented with horns and goat's feet; hence also in pl. Fauni, the same as *Pan*s, sylvan deities; < L. faunus, be propitious; see favor.] In Rom. myth., one of a class of demigods or rural deities, sometimes con-founded with satyrs. The form of the fauns was origi-nally human, but with a short goat's tail, pointed ears, and small horns; later they were represented with the hind legs of a goat, thus taking the type of the Greek Pan.

Romish Satyrs danced, and Fauns with cloven heel

From the glad sound would not be absent long.

Milton, Lycidas, l. 34.

Arise and fly

The reeling Faun, the sensual feast.

Tennyson, In Memoriam, exviii.

fauna (fā'nā), n.; pl. faunae (-nē) or faunas (-nāz). [A mod. application of the LL. Fauna, the prophesying sister of Faunus, the rural deity; see faun.] 1. The total of the animal life of a given region or period; the sum of the animals living in a given area or time; a term cor-responding to flora in respect of plants; as, the fauna of America; a fossil fauna; the recent fauna; the land and water fauna of the globe.

At present our knowledge of the terrestrial fauna of past epochs is so slight that no practical difficulty arises from using, as we do, sea reckoning for land time.

(from L. festum) festal, festival, etc.] 1. A festival in commemoration of some event or in honor of some distinguished person; a set time of festivity and rejoicing; opposed to fast.

In this sense the word is almost entirely confined to ecclesiastical feasts. In the Jewish church the most important feasts are the Sabbath, the Passover, the Feast of Weeks, the Feast of Tabernacles, the Feast of Trumpets, the Feast of Atonement, and the Feast of Dedication.

portant feasts, apart from the sabbath, were those of the Atonement, the Passover, Tabernacles, and Pentecost. To these were subsequently added the feasts of Purim and the Dedication. In the Christian church Christmas and Easter are feasts of almost universal recognition and observance. To these many others have been added, celebrating events in the life of Christ or in the lives of the apostles, saints, and martyrs. Feasts are divided into major able and immovable, according as they occur on a specified day of the week succeeding a certain day of the month or phase of the moon, or at a fixed date. Easter is a movable able feast, upon which all other movable feasts depend. Christmas is an immovable feast. In the Roman Catholic Church feasts are further divided into obligatory and non obligatory, and again into doubles, semi-doubles, simples, etc., according to the religious offices required to be recited in the church service.

=Syn. 2. Feast, Banquet, Festival. The idea of a social meal of unusual richness or abundance, for the purposes of pleasure, may be common to these words. Feast is generic; specifically, it differs from banquet in the fact that at a feast the food is abundant and choice, while at a banquet there is richness or expensiveness, and especially pomp or ceremony. The essential characteristic of a feast is concurrence in the manifestation of joy, the joyous celebration of some event, feasting being a frequent but not necessary part; as, to hold high feast. See carousal.

I would my guests should praise it, not the cooks.

Baughn, Pilgrims Progress, p. 121.

Syn. Deed, Fact, Exploit, Achievement. These words are arranged in the order of strength; deed, however, may have a much more elevated character than feat, and even surpass exploit. A deed may, on the other hand, be base or ignoble. It is, therefore, often accompanied by an adjective of quality. A feat is generally an act of remarkable skill or strength, as, the feats of a juggler, a ventriloquist, an athlete. An exploit is especially an act of boldness or bravery, with various degrees of mental power in working it out. An achievement is the result of large ability in planning, and diligence and boldness in executing. Feat, exploit, and achievement differ from act, action, and deed in that the first three always, and the last three only sometimes, represent something great.

One of the epidermal appendages which together constitute the plumage, the peculiar covering of birds; also, collectively, the plumage. Feathers are extremely modified scales. The nearest approach to them in animals other than birds is probably the quills of the porcupine. Feathers are epidermal, non-vascular, and non-nervous appendages, consisting of a horny and pithy substance, and subject to periodical molt. They grow some-* what like hairs, in a little pit or pouch formed by an invagination of the dermal layer of the integument, in a closed follicle, upon a peculiarly modified papilla, which causes the feather to assume its special shape. They are seldom implanted uniformly over the surface, but grow in special tracts or areas separated by naked spaces. (See plumage, apterium.) All of a bird's feathers collectively considered constitute the plumage or pteryx. (See cut under bird.)

A perfect feather consists of a main stem, shaft, or scape, a supplementary stem, aftershaft, or hypocaulis; and vanes, webs, or veilla. These together making the stature. The scape is divided into two parts; one, nearest the body of the bird, is the barrel, quill, or calamus, a hard, horny, hollow, semi-transparent tube with one end inserted in the skin; it bears no webs, and passes insensibly at a point marked by a little pit (unabundant) into the shaft proper or rachis. This is squarish in section, tapers to a fine point, is highly elastic, opaque, and solidly filled with dry pith; it bears the veilla. The aftershaft is usually like a miniature of the main feather, springing from the stem of the latter at the junction of the calamus and rachis. (See aftershaft.) With its vane it is called the hypoplumum. Sometimes it is as large as the main feather. There are two vanes, on opposite sides of the rachis. Each vane consists of a series of mutually appressed, thin, flat, linear or lanceolar plates, the barbs, set off obliquely from the rachis by their basal ends at a varying open angle. (See cut under barb.) To cause these plates to cohere with one another and make a webbing of the vane, each barb bears secondary vanes; these are barbules, and bear to the barbs the same relation that the barbs bear to the rachis. Barbules are also fringed, as if frayed out, along their lower edges; each such fringe makes a ramet vane. When these vanes are simple, they are termed barbules; when hooked hooklets or hamuli. (See cut under barbule.) From such perfect structure feathers may be reduced in various ways, even to lacking everything but the shaft; when this is very thick, feathers become much like scales, as in the penguin; when it is fine, they resemble hairs or bristles. In general, three types of feather structure are recognized: (1) The perfectly feathery, plumous or penaceous structure. The goose-quill used as a pen is a good example (though it lacks an aftershaft). Most contour feathers are penaceous. (2) The downy or plumaceous, such as makes up the under-plumage or down. (3) The plumaceous, which approaches a bristle or hair. (See cut under plumous.) But there is no strict line of demarcation, and in fact most feathers are penaceous with plumaceous bases of the webs. Feathers are also classified as (1) penae, plumae, or contour feathers; (2) plumae, or down feathers; (3) scapular, or half feathers; (4) plumae, or thread-feathers; and (5) plumae, dust feathers, or powder-down. (See phrases below.) The acquisition of feathers is called emulsi; their loss, edulsi. Birds which acquire feathers in the egg are Proceres or Protoproceres; those which are hatched naked are Altrices, Esopteris, or Gymnoproceres. Feathers are of extremely rapid growth. They are of many shapes, often remarkable, and of every possible color. The color is usually due to actual pigmentation, but in many cases to iridescence. The optical effect of iridescence is due to the texture of the webs. Among all epidermal structures, feathers probably combine in the highest degree the qualities of lightness, strength, and elasticity. They are also very warm, and in many cases water-proof.

Specifically—(a) A plume. (b) In founding a thin ribcass on iron framing to strengthen it and resist bending or fracture. (c) A splintted longitudinally into shaft or arbor, and projected so as to fit a groove in the eye of a wheel. (d) One of two pieces of metal placed in a hole in a stone which is to be split, a wedge-shaped key or plug being driven between them for this purpose. (e) In iron-ore, a projection on the edge of a board which fits into a channel on the edge of another board, in the operation of joining boards by grooving and feathering, or grooving and tonguing, as it is more commonly called. (f) On a horse, a sort of natural frizzling of the hair, which in some places rises above the smooth coat, and makes a figure resembling the top of an ear of wheat. (g) A foamy spray of water thrown up and backward on each side of the cutwater of a swiftly moving vessel, or from the edge of an oar when turned backward. See feather-spray. (h) The fringe of hair on the back of the legs, on the neck, or on the ears of some breeds of dogs, as setters. Also feather, a. o. In precious stones, an irregular flaw. See the extract.

Muddiness; foulness; the quality of being foul with extraneous matter or lees.—2. That which is feculent; sediment; dregs; excrementitious matter.

The fermented juice of the grapes is partly turned into liquid drops of lees, and partly into that crust or dry feculence that is commonly called tartar.

Boyle, Works, I, 580.

Thither (to cities) flow,

As to a common and most noisome sewer,

The dregs and feculence of every land.

Carper, Task, I, 684.

feculent (fē'kū-lent), a. [= F. feculent = Pr. feculent = Sp. Pg. It. feculento, < L. feculentus, adulterated in dregs or sediment, thick, impure, < faex (=faec), dregs, sediment; see feces.] Foul with extraneous or impure substances; muddy; turbid; offensive; consisting of or abounding with dregs, sediment, or excrementitious matter.

Herein may be perceived slender perforations, at which may be expressed a black and feculent matter.

Sir T. Browne, Vulg. Err., iii, 17.

fecund (fek'und or fē-kund'), a. [= ME. fecunde, < OF. fecund, F. fecund = Sp. Pg. fecundo, < It. fecundo, < L. fecundus, fruitful, fertile (of plants and animals), < √ fe*, generate, produce (see fecus), + -undus, a formative of adjectives.] Prolific; readily producing offspring; hence, fruitful or productive in a general sense; as, the fecund earth. [Recently revived and extended in application.]

Make a dyche, and yf the moorde abonde

And wol not in azayn, it is fecunde.

Palladius, Hushondrie (E. E. T. S.), p. 4.

The fecund art of Constantinople was also the parent of another style (of illumination)—the Arabian or Mahometan. Encyc. Brit., XII, 708.

While the only fecund branch of the Gallic race is that which inhabits Eastern Canada, the British people at home and abroad have displayed marvellous powers of expansion. Popul. Sci. Mo., XXVIII, 787.

The chance of encountering a spore or fecund germ, and introducing it into the flask on the wire that is charged with the others, is so remote that they have considered it unnecessary to adopt a more perfect apparatus. Pasteur, Fermentation (trans.), p. 87.

fecundate (fek'un-dāt or fē-kun'dāt), v. t.; pret. and pp. fecundated, pp. fecundating. [L. fecundatus, pp. of fecundare (> It. fecundare = Pg. Sp. Pr. fecundar = F. fecunder), make fruitful, < fecundus; see fecund.] To make fruitful or prolific; specifically, in biol., to render capable of development by the introduction of the male germ-element; impregnate.

The yolk and albumen of a fecundated egg remain sweet and free from corruption.

J. R. Nichols, Fireside Science, p. 26.

Even the Tronvires, careless and trivial as they mostly are, could fecundate a great poet like Chaucer, and are still delightful reading.

Lowell, Among my Books, 1st ser., p. 203.

fecundation (fek-un-dā'shon), n. [= F. fecundation = Sp. fecundación = Pg. fecundação = It. fecondazione, < L. as if fecundatio* (=n.), < fecundare, fecundate; see fecundate.] The act of fecundating; impregnation.

Hence we cannot infer a fertilizing condition or property of fecundation. Sir T. Browne, Vulg. Err., vii, 7.

fecundator (fek'un-dā-tor), n. [= F. fecundateur = Sp. Pg. fecundador = It. fecundatore, < L. fecundator, < L. fecundare, fecundate; see fecundate.] One who or that which fecundates.

Where the troublesome animal called the mosquito exists, there may the malarial disease exist, with the mosquito as the fecundator and carrier.

R. W. Richardson, Prevent. Med., p. 571.

fed (fed). Preterit and past participle of feed.

fedary¹, n. A contracted form of fedary¹.

Senseless bundle [a letter].

Art thou a fedary for this act, and look at

So virgin like without? Shak., Cymbeline, iii, 2.

In most modern editions the word in this passage is printed fedary, a form of different origin and meaning. The original folio of 1623 has fedary. See fedary².

I cannot distrust the successful acceptance, where the sacrifice is a thrifty boy, . . . and the presenter a fedary to such as are masters, not more of their own fortunes than their own affections. Ford, Line of Life.

feddan (fed'an), n. [Ar. fadān, faddān, a plow with yoke of oxen.] A land-measure of the Levant, consisting of as much as a yoke of oxen can plow in a day. In Egypt the legal feddan (according to the official statement dated 1831, transmitting standards to the Russian government, and according to the measure of one of these standards by the Russian commission) is 1.08 English acres; while under the Mamelukes it was 1.3 acres.

The feddan, the most common measure of land, was, a few years ago, equal to about an English acre and one tenth.

E. W. Lane, Modern Egyptians, I, 371.

feddlet, v. t. An obsolete form of fuddle.

fedet, v. An obsolete form of feed.

feder (fē'dēr), n. and v. An obsolete or dialectal form of feather.

federacy (fē'dē-rā-si), n.; pl. federacies (-sīz). [federat (cf. confederacy).] A confederation; confederacy. [Rare.]

There remain coins of several states of the league, and also coins of the league itself—a plain indication both of the sovereignty exercised by the several members and of the sovereignty exercised by the whole federacy.

Brougham.

federal (fē'dē-rāl), a. and n. [f. fédéral = Sp. Pg. federal; < L. as if federalis*, < fœdus (fœder-), a league, treaty, covenant, akin to fides, faith; see faith, fidelity.] I. a. 1. Pertaining to a league, covenant, or contract; derived from a covenant between parties, particularly between nations.

The Romans compelled them, contrary to all federal right, . . . to part with Sardinia.

Grove.

It [the eucharist] is a federal rite betwixt God and us.

Hammond.

2. Confederated; founded on an alliance by confederation or compact for mutual support; as, the federal diet of the old German empire.

—3. Pertaining to a union of states in some essential degree constituted by and deriving its power from the people of all, considered as an entirety, and not solely by and from each of the states separately; as, a federal government, such as the governments of the United States, Switzerland, and some of the Spanish-American republics. A federal government is properly one in which the federal authority is independent of any of its component parts within the sphere of the federal action; distinguished from a confederate government, in which the states alone are sovereign, and which possesses no inherent power.

The wants of the union are to be supplied in one way or another; if by the authority of the federal government, then it will not remain to be done by that of the state governments.

A. Hamilton, Federalist, No. xxxvi.

The definition of treason against the United States . . . took notice of the federal character of the American government by defining it as levying war against the United States, or any one of them.

Bancroft, Hist. Const., II, 149.

Both these leagues [the Achaian federation and the Aetolian League] were instances of true federal government, and were not mere confederations; that is, the central government acted directly upon all the citizens, and not merely upon the local governments.

J. Fiske, Amer. Pol. Ideas, p. 76.

But Jefferson pointed out that party divisions must always exist in every free and deliberate society, and that if on a temporary superiority of the one party the other should resort to disunion, no Federal government could ever exist.

Schouler, Hist. U. S., I, 422.

4. Favorable to federation; supporting the principle of a union of states under a common government; specifically, in the United States, relating to, or adhering to, the support of the Federal Constitution.—5. In the American civil war, pertaining to or supporting the Union or federal government.

Federal City, Washington, as the seat of the government of the United States.—Federal Constitution. See Constitution of the United States, under constitution.—Federal headship, in the system of federal theology, the headship of Adam, who is regarded as the federal head of the race, because he was the one with whom, as a representative of the race, the covenant of works was made by God, prior to the fall.—Federal party, in U. S. hist., a name applied first to those who favored the adoption by the States of the constitution framed by the Constitutional Convention at Philadelphia in 1787, and later to the party which in the first years of the federal government became fully formed under the leadership of Alexander Hamilton. It controlled the general government till 1801, then declined, and about 1824 became extinct. Its chief aims were the creation and maintenance of a strong central government, the strengthening of the spirit of nationalism, the control of politics by the more intelligent and substantial classes, the fostering of commercial interests, and the preservation of friendly relations with Great Britain.

On the one side, the undivided phalanx of the federal party (for they had not then taken the name of whigs).

T. H. Benton, Thirty Years, I, 225.

Federal theology. See theology.

II. n. 1. A supporter of federation; one devoted to a union of states in a national government or to its preservation; a unionist. Specifically—2. [cap.] In the American civil war, a Unionist; particularly, a Union soldier; opposed to Confederate.

A sharp action occurred, resulting in the capture of many Federals.

N. A. Rev., CXXVI, 255.

federalisation, federalise. See federalization, federalize.

federalism (fē'dē-rāl-iz-əm), n. [= F. fédéralisme = Sp. Pg. It. federalismo; as federal + -ism.] The doctrine or system of federation or federal union in government; the principle of assigning to the care of a central government such matters of common concernment as may be agreed upon, and all others to that of the governments of the federated states, provinces, or tribes; more specifically, the aggregate principles or doctrines of a federal party, as the Federalists of the United States. Federalism has been practised by many uncivilized races, as the ancient German tribes and some of the American Indians, chiefly for warlike purposes. It existed for certain civil purposes also among the Greeks and other ancient and medieval peoples, as in the English heptarchy, was more largely developed in the old German empire, and has since been adopted in many countries, especially republics. (See federal, a. 2.) Its introduction into France was advocated by the Girondists after the fall of the monarchy.

We see every man that the Jacobins choose to apprehend taken up, . . . whether he be suspected of royalism or federalism, modernism, democracy royal, or any other of the names of the faction which they start by the hour.

Burke, Policy of the Allies.

Intense Federalist as he was, his Federalism agreed with a stout anti-aristocratic spirit.

H. E. Scudder, Noah Webster, p. 46.

Stated broadly, so as to acquire somewhat the force of a universal proposition, the principle of federalism is just this: that the people of a state shall have full and entire control of their own domestic affairs, which directly concern them only, and which they will naturally manage with more intelligence and with more zeal than any distinct governing body could possibly exercise; but that, as regards matters of common concern between a group of states, a decision shall in every case be reached, not by brutal warfare or by weary diplomacy, but by the systematic legislation of a central government which represents both states and people, and whose decisions can always be enforced, if necessary, by the combined physical power of all the states.

J. Fiske, Amer. Pol. Ideas, p. 133.

The method by which federalism attempts to reconcile the apparently inconsistent claims of national sovereignty and of state sovereignty consists of the formation of a constitution under which the ordinary powers of sovereignty are elaborately divided between the common or national government and the separate States.

A. F. Dicey, Law of Const., p. 131.

federalist (fē'dē-rāl-ist), n. [= F. fédéraliste = Sp. Pg. It. federalista; as federal + -ist.] 1. In politics, an advocate or a supporter of federalism; specifically, an advocate of a close union of states under a common government, or a supporter of such a union as against those who would weaken or destroy it; in U. S. hist. [cap.], a member of the Federal party. See federal, a.

And according to the degree of pleasure and pride we feel in being republicans ought to be our zeal in cherishing the spirit and supporting the character of federalists.

Madison, Federalist, No. x.

The Federalists were the only proper Tories our politics have ever produced, whose conservatism truly represented an idea, and not a mere selfish interest—men who honestly distrusted democracy, and stood up for experience, or the tradition which they believed for such, against empiricism.

Loebl, Study Windows, p. 105.

The party name of Federalist has since become historical; and yet, to speak logically, it was the Anti-Federal party that sustained a federal plan, while the Federalist contended for one more nearly national.

Schouler, Hist. U. S., I, 54.

2. One who accepts the federal theology (which see, under theology).

federalization (fē'dē-rāl-iz-ā'shən), n. [f. federalize + -ation.] 1. The act of federalizing, or the state of being federalized.—2. Confederation; federal union. Stiles. [Rare.]

Also federalisation.

federalize (fē'dē-rāl-iz), v.; pret. and pp. federalized, ppr. federalizing. [f. federal + -ize.] I. trans. To make federal; impart a federal or confederate character to.

II. intrans. To unite by compact; league, as different states; confederate for political purposes. Barlow. [Rare.]

Also federalise.

federally (fē'dē-rāl-ē), adv. In a federal or joint manner; in accordance with a covenant or league.

Nevertheless the transgression of Adam, who had all mankind Federalia, yea. Naturally, in him, has involved this infant in the guilt of it.

C. Matthee, quoted in O. W. Holmes's Med. Essays, p. 260.

federary (fē'dē-rā-rē), n. [Also in shortened form fedaray; < L. as if federarius*, < fœdus (fœder-), a league; see federal.] A confederate; an accomplice.

More, she's a traitor; and Camillo is

A federary with her. Shak., W. I, ii, 1.

[This word is so printed in the original folio, which is unusually correct in the printing of this play. It occurs nowhere else except in the contracted form fedaray, also used by Shakespeare and others. Some editors prefer to read fedaray (which see) in both passages.]

federate (fē'dē-rāt), v. t.; pret. and pp. federated, ppr. federating. [f. L. federatus, pp. of federare, league together. < fœdus (fœder-), a league; see federal.] To form into a federation; constitute as a federation.

Did the Chancellor himself, too, dream of federating the Continent against England? Low, Re-march, II, 162.

Members of a federated empire which has accomplished such notable work.

Contemporary Rev., I, 175.

If any change is made, the British Empire must cease to exist as such, and what was an Empire must become (of anything) either a confederacy or a Federated Nation.

Nineteenth Century, XIX, 333.

federate (fē'dē-rāt), a. [= Sp. Pg. federado = It. federato, < L. federatus, pp. of federare, establish by treaty or league; see federal, v.] Leagued; confederate; federal; as, federate nations or powers; "a federate alliance," Warburton Alliance, ii. [Rare.]

federation (fē'dē-rā'shən), n. [= F. fédération = Sp. federación = Pg. federação = It. federazione, < L. as if federalitatem*, < federare, league together; see federal.] 1. The act of uniting in confederation by league and covenant.

If federation of the colonies be partly accomplished, the path was opened up by another Irishman.

Contemporary Rev., LIII, 27.

2. A league; a confederacy; a federal alliance.

That renowned federation [the United Provinces] had reached the height of power, prosperity, and glory.

Macaulay, Hist. Eng., II.

Till the war-drum throbbed no longer, and the battle flags were furled.

In the Parliament of man, the Federation of the world.

Tennyson, Locksley Hall.

The nation as such is brutally immoral. Nor is there much hope or cheer in the prospect of a federation of nations, even if there were any signs of its coming, and not rather a crowd of patents indicative of the creation of new nationalities more essentially antagonistic than the old.

H. Taylor, Mind, XIII, 431.

3. A federal government, as that of the United States, Switzerland, or Germany. Feast of the federation, the name given to an assemblage of several hundred thousand persons from all parts of France in the Champ de Mars, Paris, July 14th, 1790 (the first anniversary of the storming of the Bastille), at which, with religious solemnities and amid frenzied rejoicings, the king and all classes, but especially delegates from all military bodies, took an oath to support the newly established constitution and liberties of the country. = Syn. See confederation.

federationist (fē'dē-rā'shən-ist), n. [f. federation + -ist.] One who favors political federation; specifically, one who advocates the establishment of a federal union among the parts of the British empire.

We cannot wonder, therefore, if such a successful federationist as Sir John Macdonald anticipates in Australasia, and even in South Africa, the same successful results as have been obtained in Canada.

Fortnightly Rev., N. S., XXXIX, 295.

federative (fē'dē-rā-tiv), a. [= F. fédératif = Sp. Pg. federativo; as federal + -ive.] Of, pertaining to, or of the nature of federation; uniting in a league; federal; as, a federative government; the federative principle.

They . . . suggest to them leagues of perpetual amity at the very time when the power to which our constitution has exclusively delegated the federative capacity of this kingdom may find it expedient to make war upon them.

Burke, Rev., in France.

An interesting inquiry here arises, whether the treaty-making power in a federative union, like the United States, can alienate the domain of one of the states without its consent.

Woolsen, Introduct. to Int'l. Law, § 29.

federatively (fē'dē-rā-tiv-lē), adv. In a federative or federal manner; as a league or confederacy.

The periodical disorders to which federatively constituted states are liable.

He lay for feck to Northumberland
The Peck and Northumberland Ballad, IV, 179.

3. To cause to engage with a person for domestic or other service; as, a man fees his son to a farmer. [See Scotch.]

fee (fē), v. t. [< ME. fē, pl. fē, fē, an estate held in trust or under conditions, a feud, as stimulated by a feud, to fē, fē, property, etc.

(with which it is ult. identical), < OE. fied, fie, feu, var. of fieu, later fief. > E. fief (which does not seem to occur in ME.; see feoff). < ML. feudum, property held in fee: see fief, feoff, feud.] 1. An estate in land, of indefinite duration, granted by and held of a superior lord, in whom the ultimate title resides, on condition of performing some service in return. See feud. 2. In this, which is its original sense, it implies the idea of reward for service or allegiance, and was used in contradistinction to estates in allodium, or entire property, which were generally small allotments held free of any obligation.

The tenure of lands is altogether grounded on military laws, and held as a fee under princes.

Hooker, Eccles. Polity, v. 80.

2. An estate of inheritance; an estate in land belonging to the owner and his heirs and assigns forever. In the latter case it is more specifically termed a fee simple. (See conditional fee (b), below.) The fee is the highest and most extensive interest that a person can have in lands. In this sense the king might have a fee, but not in the sense of def. 1. After the abolition of the feudal system the word continued to be used of real property; and although in the United States generally land is held in allodium, the private ownership, if subject to no paramount right except that of eminent domain vested in the State, is termed the fee. The word when unqualified may or may not mean an absolute or unqualified fee, or fee simple.

3. Estate in general; property; possession; ownership.

Those Ladies, which then sawest late,
Are Venus damzels, all within her fee,
But dittering in honour and degree,
Spenser, F. Q., VI, x, 21.

Once did she [Venice] hold the gorgeous East in fee,
And was the safeguard of the West.
Wordsworth, Extinction of the Venetian Republic.

My life and I are lords of more Than thrice this kingdom's fee, Lowell, Singing Leaves.

Base fee, a qualified fee; a freehold estate of inheritance to which a qualification is annexed, so that it must terminate whenever the qualification is at an end; more specifically, in the English law of settlements, the estate created by absolute alienation by a tenant in tail alone (see entail), which, being made without the consent of the protector, does not bar remaindermen or reversioners, but only the grantor's own issue, and hence is liable to be defeated by the failure of such issue.

The curious kind of estate created by the conveyance in fee simple of a tenant in tail not in possession, without the concurrence of the owners of estates preceding his own, is called a base fee. P. Pollock, Land Laws, p. 108.

Conditional fee. (a) Any fee granted upon condition. (b) A fee limited to particular heirs or a particular class of heirs, under the common-law rule that, on the donee's issue having such heirs, the estate became absolute for all purposes of alienation, on the ground that a condition once performed was at an end. (See entail.) To designate this kind of conditional fee at the common law, the more appropriate phrase is fee simple conditional. This evasion of the intent of donors to reserve a reversion on a failure of heirs was put an end to by a statute known as De Donis, which enacted that the will of the donor should be observed, and that on the failure of heirs the property should revert to the donor. The estate of the donee under this statute was termed a fee tail. See tail, 2. (c) Later, the term conditional fee was applied to the estate of a mortgagee of land, under a mortgage in the usual form, which was regarded as vesting the fee in the mortgagee subject to its being divested by performance of the condition, namely payment. Determinable fee, a fee determinable by a condition or a conditional limitation; more specifically, a fee created by a limitation to the grantee and his heirs till the happening of a future event which may or may not happen, as a gift to A and his heirs, and if A dies without issue, then to another. Fee simple, fee simple absolute, a fee that is not qualified. See def. 2. Fee tail. See conditional fee (b). Great fee, the holding of a tenant of the crown.

By the feudal law, a great fee or great lordship, which are convertible terms, was the highest order of possession, and was held directly from the crown.

Raines, Hist. Lancashire, II, 11.

In his demain as of fee. See demain. Limited fee, a determinable fee; more specifically, a fee determinable by a conditional limitation. Plowman's fee, peasant tenure; the custom by which lands descended to all the sons of the tenant in equal shares, with, however, some privilege or birthright in favor of the elder or younger son. A rule of descent which under the feudal system gave way to primogeniture.

The strict English primogeniture as applied to the knight-holdings, sometimes called feudal tenure or plowman's fee.
Lucas, Brit., XIX, 735.

Qualified fee, a base fee; a freehold estate of inheritance to which a qualification is annexed, so that it must terminate whenever the qualification is at an end, more specifically, the estate created by a limitation to the grantee and his heirs or an ancestor of his in the paternal line whose heir he also is, as a gift to B and the heirs of A, his father.

feeable (fē'-a-bl), a. [Early mod. E. also feeable; < fee + -able.] Capable of being feod; capable of being hired or bribed.

feeble (fē'-bl), a. and n. [< ME. feble, rarely feble, fehal, < AF. feble, OF. feble, feuble, feuble < E. feble, etc.; earlier OF. febi, feuble, feble, etc., F. feble = Fr. feble, feble, feble = Sp. feble = Pg. febre = It. fevole, weak, feeble, <

From the middle of October till the end of May, my horses get one feed of steamed food . . . daily.
Quoted in Encyc. Brit., I. 386.

5. In mech.: (a) The motion or advance of any material which is being fed to a machine, as of cloth to the needle of a sewing-machine. (b) The material upon which a machine operates, as the grain running into a grinding-mill. (c) The advance of a cutting-tool, as the cutter of a planer, or the chisel of a lathe, upon or into the material to be cut.—6†. [Var. of food.] Same as food, n., 4.

Can hear, can hear, ye freely feed,
And lay your head bow on my knee.
Keats, Child's Ballad, l. 138.

7. The amount of water needed in a canal-lock to allow of the passage of a boat.—8. In stone-sawing, sand and water employed to assist the saw-blade in cutting.

To prevent the sand and water, called the feed, from flowing out between the stones, the interval is filled up with straw rammed in firmly between the two blocks.
Burne, Artisan's Handbook, p. 86.

Differential feed, a device for securing a slow and powerful regular forward movement of a tool.—Syn. 1. Feed, Food, Fodder, Provender, Forage. Feed for animals, especially animals kept for work or fattening for the market; food for human beings and the smaller animals, household pets, etc.; fodder, dry or green feed for animals, but not pasturage; provender, dry feed. Forage is rarely used except for fodder furnished for horses in an army, generally by foraging. Food is also a general word for that which supplies nourishment to any organized body.

And homeless near a thousand homes I stood,
And near a thousand tables piled and wanted food, Wordsworth, Guilt and Sorrow.

The great cost of cattle, and the sickening of their cattle upon such wild fodder as was never cut before; the loss of their sheep and swine by wolves, . . . are the other disasters enumerated by the historian.

Emerson, Hist. Discourse at Concord.
Tita. Say, sweet love, what thou desirest to eat.
Bot. Truly, a peck of provender: I could munch your good dry oats.
Shak., M. N. D., iv. 1.

All oats, Indian corn, or rather forage that wagons or horses bring to the camp, . . . is to be taken for the use of the enemy. Franklin, Autobiog., p. 216.

feed-apron (fēd'ā-pron), n. In mech., an apron carrying material or feed to some part of a machine.

feeder (fē'dēr), n. 1. One who or that which feeds, or supplies food or nourishment.

Swinish gluttony
Ne'er looks to Heaven amidst his gorgeous feast,
But with besotted base ingratitude
Grans, and blasphemes his feeder.
Milton, Comus, l. 779.

The plant or animal on which a parasite lives is termed its host or feeder. De Bary, Fungi (trans.), p. 358.

The patch is kind enough; but a huge feeder.
Shak., M. of V., ii. 5.
Bless'd he not both the feeder and the food?
Quarles, Emblems, i. 1.

Have your worms well scoured, and not kept in sour and musty moss, for he [the barbel] is a curious [fastidious] feeder. I. Walton, Complete Angler, p. 168.

4†. A servant or dependent supported by his lord; a parasite.

I will your very faithful feeder be,
And buy it with your good night suddenly.
Shak., As you Like it, ii. 4.

Mr. Thornhill came with a couple of friends, his chaplain and feeder. Goldsmith, Vicar, vii.

5. One who fattens cattle for slaughter.—6. That which feeds or supplies; anything that serves for the conveyance of material or supplies to, or furnishes communication with, something else: as, great rivers are valuable feeders of commerce; cross-roads and lanes are feeders to the highway.

Dialects have always been the feeders rather than the channels of a literary language.

Max Müller, Science of Language, p. 60. Specifically —(a) A fountain, stream, or channel that supplies a main canal with water. (b) A branch or side rail road running into and increasing the business of the main line. (c) In mining, a branch or spur falling into the main lode, and appearing to add to its width or richness; a dropper. (d) Any device or contrivance for delivering to a machine the feed or materials to be operated upon, as the apron of a carter, the feed-wheel of a sewing-machine, the feeding device of a saw-mill, rail-machine, grain-mill, etc. (e) In iron-ore-bulking, a small oblique bellows placed under (occasionally apart from) the large horizontal storage bellows, and used to furnish air to the latter. The mechanical power is applied to the feeder, not to the bellows proper, though the steadiness and pressure of the wind depend solely upon the size and weighting of the latter. (f) In heat, engin., a subordinate role written to bring out the peculiarities of an important part.

7. One who feeds a machine, as a printing-press: as, pressmen and feeders. See feeding, 4.—8. In entom., one of the organs composing the mouth-parts or trophi. Kerby.

feed-head (fēd'hēd), n. 1. A cistern of water placed above the boiler of a steam-engine and supplying it with water.—2. In casting, extra metal above the mold used to supply the waste caused by contraction in the mold; a dead-head or head. Also called riser.

feed-heater (fēd'hē-tēr), n. 1. An apparatus for raising the temperature of the water supplied to a steam-boiler, either by the direct heat of the fire or indirectly by exposing it to the latent heat of the exhaust-steam from the engine. Such boilers are also designed to purify the feed-water by filtering out solid impurities, by precipitating lime or other materials that might form incrustations in the boiler, and by restraining oil and grease by means of absorbent filters.

2. A boiler for cooking food for cattle.

feeding (fē'ding), n. [Verbal n. of feed, v.] 1. The act of taking or giving food; the act of eating or of giving to eat.—2. That which is eaten.

Their most feeding is fish. Hakluyt's Voyages, I. 311.
Contention, like a horse
Full of high feeding, madly hath broke loose.
Shak., 2 Hen. IV., i. 1.

3. That which furnishes food, especially for animals; pasture-land.

They call him bovicles; and [the] boars himself
To have a worthy feeding. Shak., W. T., iv. 3.

Finding the feeding, for which he had told
To have kept safe, by these vile cattle spoil'd.
Deighton, Mooncalf.

Meadows, Greens, Pastures, Feedings.
Steele, Grace A-la Mode, i. 1.

4. In printing (press-work), the placing of separate sheets of paper in position, so that they can be printed or ruled by a printing- or a ruling-machine. Also called, in England, laying-on.

feeding-bottle (fē'ding-bot'l), n. A bottle for supplying milk or other liquid nutriment to an infant.

feeding-engine (fē'ding-en-jin), n. An engine used to feed a boiler or other reservoir.

feeding-ground (fē'ding-ground), n. A place where an animal resorts to feed; said of either sea or land, and often in the plural.

feed-motion (fēd'mō-shon), n. In mech., the machinery that gives motion to the parts called the feed in machines.

feed-pipe (fēd'pāp), n. In a steam-engine, the pipe leading from the feed-pump or from an elevated cistern to the bottom of the boiler.

feed-pump (fēd'pūmp), n. The force-pump employed in supplying the boiler of a steam-engine with water.

feed-rack (fēd'rak), n. A rack or holder for hay, grain, or other food for cattle.

feed-roll (fēd'rōl), n. In mech., any roller of which the function is to feed or supply to the mechanism the material to be operated upon, as, in a typewriter, a roll covered with india-rubber or other elastic material, which moves the paper as required, line by line.

feed-screw (fēd'skrō), n. A long screw used in large lathes to impart a regular feed-motion or advance to the tool-rest or to the work itself.

feed-trough (fēd'trōf), n. A trough in which is placed food for animals, especially for swine. [U. S.] feed-water (fēd'wā'tēr), n. Warmed water supplied to the boiler of a steam-engine by the feed-pump through the feed-pipe.

It is very important that the feed-water should be introduced into the boiler at as high a temperature as possible. R. Wilson, Steam Boilers, p. 127.

fee-estate (fē'es-tāt), n. In Eng. law, a tenure of lands or tenements for which some service or acknowledgment is paid to the chief lord.

fee-farm (fē'fārm), n. [< fee² + farm¹] 1. Land held by one as tenant in fee of another, without homage, fealty, or other service, except that mentioned in the feoffment, usually the full rent.

Fee-farm (feoh trima, or fee farm rent, is when the lord, upon the creation of the tenancy, reserves to himself and his heirs either the rent for which it was before let to farm, or was reasonably worth, or at least a fourth part of the value; without homage, fealty, or other services beyond what are especially comprised in the feoffment. S. Powell, Taxes in England, I. 131, note.

2. The estate of the tenant in land so held.

His Maty renewed us our lease of says Court pastures for 99 years, but ought, according to his solemn promise (as I hope he will still perform), have passed them to us in fee-farm. Fishers' Diary, Jan. 12, 1672.

Fee-farm rent, the rent payable by the tenant of a fee-farm.

The Duke of Buckingham . . . hath about 19 cool, a-year, of which he pays away about 7000 l. a-year in interest, about 2000 l. in fee-farm rents to the King, about 2000 l. in wages and pensions, and the rest to live upon, and pay taxes for the whole. Pepys' Diary, IV, 102.

fee-farmer (fē'fār mēr), n. One who holds land from a superior lord in fee-farm.

As when bright Phoebus (Landlord of the Light)

And his fee-farmer Luna must be parted,

He sets to some ner but she comes in sight.

Dantes, Holy Roode, p. 13.

Tennyson, Pelleas and Ettarre.

(b) To become aware of through material action upon any senses of sensation other than those of sight, hearing, taste, and smell; have a sensation (other than those of the above mentioned senses) of; as, to feel the cold; to feel a lump in the throat (through involuntary closure); to feel an inclination to cough. [The application of the word to the normal action of the higher senses is obsolete, except in the abstract meaning of perceiving by means of sensation in general, as the higher animals feel light, heat, sound, etc. See def. 2.]

They, of several feels those earthquakes which do more damage on the neighbouring continent.

De Witt, Description of the East II, ii, 9.

2. To perceive by the sense of smell; smell.

The streets were strowed with small grass, and incense and myrrour, in lines in the streets. Think, and in the way . . . in my lighter, and so wide, I could through the gates that for distant men should feel the colour.

Milton (l. l. 1, 8, 9) ii, 133.

They felt a most delicate, sweet, smell, though they saw not what it was, but they felt it, thinking it the colour of the flowers. Quoted in Capt. John Smith's Works, I, 81.

3. To have a perception of (some external or internal condition of things) through a more or less mental state involving vague sense-perception; to feel the floor sinking; to feel one's head confused; to feel the approach of indistinct perception or mental impression of; as, to feel pleasure or pain; to feel the beauty of a landscape.

If that he may fele, out of drede,
That ye me touche or love in vilonye,
Be right anon wil sle you with the dede.

Chaucer, Second Nun's Tale, l. 155.

And furthermore, as I this mater fele,
In his conseyte, I say yow certeynly, Hym liked never creatur so wele.

Geoffrey (E. E. T. S.), l. 695.

To feel, altho' no tongue can prove,
That every cloud, that spreads above
And veileth love, itself is love.

Tennyson, Two Voices.

We speak of feeling this thing and that, which we no doubt do feel, but which we only feel because we are self-conscious; because in feeling we distinguish ourselves from the feelings as their subject.

T. H. Green, Prolegomena to Ethics, § 118.

5. To regard with feeling or emotion; be aroused to feeling (especially disagreeable feeling) by; as, he felt his disgrace keenly.

From the poet's lips

His verse sounds doubly sweet, for none like him

Feels every cadence of its wave-like flow.

O. W. Holmes, Sympathies.

6. Reflexively, to have a sensation, feeling, perception, or impression concerning; perceive clearly to be.

She began, for the first time that evening, to feel herself at a ball; she longed to dance, but she had not an acquaintance in the room.

Jane Austen, Northanger Abbey, p. 8.

7. To try by touch; examine by touching with the hands or otherwise; test by contact; as, to feel a piece of cloth; to feel the ground with the feet; a blind man feels his way with a stick.

Come near, I pray thee, that I may feel thee, my son, whether thou be my very son Esau or not. Gen. xxvii, 21.

Three times he try'd, and studiously felt

How to unbuckle his out-shin'd belt.

J. Beaumont, Psyche, iii, 70.

The Doctor . . . felt her Pulse; he view'd her Eyes.

Prior, Paolo Furcanti.

Hence—8. To make trial of in any way; test carefully or cautiously; as, to feel one's way in an undertaking; to feel the market by a small venture.

than they that felt the punishment?

Spenser, State of Ireland.

To feel out, to try; sound; search for; explore; as, to feel out one's opinions or designs. [Rare.] To feel the helm, to come under the influence of the helm; said of a ship when she begins to have steerage-way. — Syn. Feel, be sensible of, be conscious of, are all used of a recognition that comes close home, a frank confession to one's self, often, to feel is especially the act of the heart; as, to feel one's own defects. To be conscious may be only the act of the understanding, apart even from reflection; as, to be conscious of the approach of danger; or it may rise to a high degree of frank admission; as, to be conscious of failure. To be sensible is the act of a sort of inward sensuous perception. See sensitible.

All men feel sometimes the falsehood which they cannot demonstrate.

Emerson, Compensation.

These are very visible that they had better have pushed their conquests.

Addison.

My mother! when I learn'd that thou wast dead,

Say, were thou conscious of the tears I shed?

Cooper, On the Receipt of my Mother's Picture.

II. intrans. 1. To have perception by means of the sense of touch or by physical contact; experience sensation of any kind, except that received through sight, hearing, taste, or smell; loosely, to have a sensation of any kind; as, to feel sore or ill; to feel cold.

I then did feel full sick, and yet not well

Shak., Ham. VIII, ii, 4.

If the skin felt everywhere exactly alike, a foot being could be distinguished from a total immersion as being smaller, but never distinguished from a well hand.

B. James, Mind, XII, 181.

Feeling warm or feeling hungry, we must remember, is not pure feeling in the strict sense of the word.

J. Ward, Envy, But., XX, 49.

2. To have perception, especially vague perception or impression; have a mental sense of something.

We think, ser, as ferre as I coume fele.

These lordes and these knyghtes every one

In this mater they have not sayde but wele.

Geoffrey (E. E. T. S.), l. 1654.

From sense of grief and pain we shall be free:
We shall not feel, because we shall not be.

Dryden, tr. of Lucretius, iii, 12.

When truth or virtue an affront endures,
The affront is mine, my friend, and should be yours. . . .
Mine, as a friend to every worthy mind;
And mine as man, who feels as for mankind.

Pope, Epil. to Satires, ii, 204.

3. To recognize or regard one's self as; be consciously; as, to feel hurried; to feel called on to do something.

He felt obliged to sail again for the East in order to retrieve his fortune.

J. T. Fields, Underbrush, p. 216.

4. To experience feeling or emotion; be aroused to emotion.

How heavy guilt is, when men come to feel!

C. S. Grant, Personal Memoirs, I, 512.

(b) To sympathize with; be sorry for.

Poor young lady! I feel for her already! for I can conceive how great the conflict must be between her passion and her duty.

Sheridan, The Critic, ii, 1.

To feel of, to obtain knowledge of by the sense of touch; make tactful examination of; test by handling.

They usually gather them before they be full ripe, boring an hole in them, and feeling of the kernel, they know if they be ripe enough for their purpose.

feel¹ (fēl), n. [*cf. feel*¹, v.] 1. The sense or a sensation of touch.

Dyed cotton fibre . . . was thinner and softer to the feel.

O'Neill, Dyeing and Calico Printing, p. 209.

Colours, mere states of the retina, are all we see; sounds, mere ringings in the ear, are all we hear; feels, mere states of our own (as warm or cold, etc.), are all we touch.

Mind, X, 53.

2. A sensation of any kind, or a vague mental impression or feeling.

Green little vaulter in the sunny grass,

Catching your heart up at the feel of June.

L. Hunt, Grasshopper and Cricket.

3. That quality in an object by which it appeals to the sense of touch.

Membranous or papery . . . as to feel and look.

Is. Taylor.

A small elevation, . . . like a vesicle, having a soft feel.

The feelefold colours and deccytes of thilke mervayles monstre Fortune. Chaucer, Boethius, ii, prose I.

And he turned hym as tye and thanne toke I hede,
It was fouler by feelefold than it fyrste semed.
Piers Plouman (B), xiii, 320.

feeler (fē'lér), n. 1. One who or that which feels.

Had I this check,
To bathe my lips upon; this hand, whose touch,
Whose every touch, would force the feeler's soul
To the oath of loyalty. Shak., Cymbeline, i, 7.

He [Thoreau] was not a strong thinker, but a sensitive feeler. Lowell, Study Windows, ii, 207.

Specifically—2. Any special organ of touch of an animal; a tactile part. (a) A common name applied to the antennae of insects and crustaceans, and to the palpi of insects and spiders. These organs probably serve as organs of touch as well as for other purposes. See antenna and pulpus. (b) A tentacle of any kind. (c) A cirrus of a cirripes, as one of the legs of a barnacle. (d) A whisker or rictal vibrissa.

The long whiskers or feelers of many animals, as the cat.
Mirart, Elem. Anat., p. 243.

3. The representation on an artificial fly of an antenna of an insect. Feelers are folded back, extending above and sometimes beyond the wings.

The feelers, which, by a great stretch of imagination, are supposed to represent the antennae of a natural fly, are the two long fibres of macaw tail feather tied in on each side of the head, and extending back over the wings.
Sportsman's Gazetteer, p. 600.

4. Any indirect act, device, stratagem, or plan resorted to for the purpose of finding out something which cannot be ascertained directly, especially the designs, opinions, or sentiments of others.

After putting forth his right leg now and then as a feeler, the victim who dropped the money ventures to make one or two distinct dives after it. Dickens, Sketches, i.

5. Naut., the first onset of a storm, followed by a short calm.—Long feeler, the antenna proper of a crustacean.—Short feeler. Same as antennula, 3.

feeling (fē'ling), n. [Verbal n. of *feol*¹, v.] 1. The act of sensing or perceiving by sensation. Specifically—(a) The act of perceiving by touch, or the sense of touch. (b) More comprehensively, all that part of the sensory function (as the sensing of cold, hunger, etc.) which is not included in the special senses of sight, hearing, smell, and taste. See touch, n.

Why was the sight
To such a tender ball as the eye confined,
And not, as feeling, through all parts diffused?
Milton, S. A., I, 196.

2. A sensation. Specifically—(a) A sensation conveyed by the sense of touch. (b) More comprehensively, sensation of any kind not assignable to one of the special senses of sight, hearing, taste, and smell; as, a feeling of warmth; a feeling of pain; a feeling of drowsiness.

Some of the organs in their sound condition have no organic feelings. G. T. Ladd, Physiol. Psychology, p. 513.

3. The immediate quality of what is present to consciousness in sensation, desire, or emotion, considered apart from all activity of thought; the pure sense-element in consciousness; in a loose use, any element of consciousness not recognizable as thought or will. The word (that is, its equivalent) was introduced into philosophy as an exact term in this sense by Fetsch, a German Wollian philosopher of the eighteenth century. Kant modified the meaning for the convenience of his system, so as to restrict it as in def. 4, below.

The point which at present concerns us is simply that, when feeling is said to be the primordial element in consciousness, more is usually included under feeling than pure pleasure and pain, viz., some characteristic or quality by which one pleasurable or painful sensation is distinguishable from another. J. Ward, Encyc. Brit., XX, 40.

I have in this volume used Feeling as the name for the genus of which Sensation (with Muscular Feeling) and Emotion are the two species.
J. Bain, Emotions and Will, p. 625, App.

It cannot be too strongly urged in the face of mystical attempts, however learned, that there is not a landmark, not a length, not a point of the compass in real space which is not some one of our feelings, either experienced directly as a presentation or ideally suggested by another feeling which has come to serve as its sign.
W. James, Mind, XII, 208.

Feelings which correspond directly with an interaction between the organism and its environment are termed sensations—those which correspond indirectly are termed emotions; and when the remoteness from direct correspondence is great, the feeling is in some cases termed a sentiment. C. Mercier, Mind, IX, 335.

It may be needed to guard against a further misconception, and to state explicitly that the term feeling, in the most general term in psychology, includes emotion, not less than sensation and perception.
G. H. Lewes, Troths. of Life and Mind, II, iv, § 17.

4. In a restricted sense, pleasure or pain; any state or element of consciousness having a pleasurable or a painful aspect.

As to the meaning of the term, it is plain that further definition is requisite for a word that may mean (a) a touch, as feeling of roughness; (b) an organic sensation, as feeling of hunger; (c) an emotion, as feeling of anger; (d) feeling proper, as pleasure or pain. But, even taking feeling in the last, its strict sense, it has been maintained that all the more complex forms of consciousness are resolvable into, or at least have been developed from, feelings of pleasure and pain. J. Ward, Encyc. Brit., XX, 40.

The feeling, the pleasurable or painful tone of the sensation, is always recognized as purely and simply a way in which the mind is affected.
G. T. Ladd, Physiol. Psychology, p. 504.

Hence—5. An emotion in so far as it is immediately present to consciousness, not having regard to the physiological disturbance which is one of its elements; the capacity for emotion; mental state, disposition, or faculty as regards emotion; as, a feeling of sympathy; a feeling of pride in the history of one's country. See emotion, 2.

Great persons had need to borrow other men's opinions to think themselves happy, for if they judge by their own feeling, they cannot find it. Bacon, Great Place (ed. 1857).

Nor, again, can we admit without verification the proposition which some philosophers, including Aristotle (and Plato in some passages), seem to assume a priori: that the kind of feeling which is most pleasant or preferable as feeling will always accompany the kind of activity which we approve. H. Sidgwick, Methods of Ethics, p. 162.

The motive of all action is feeling. All great movements in history are preceded and accompanied by strong feelings. L. F. Ward, Dynami. Sociol., I, 11.

The good-hearted old fellow . . . betrayed some feeling at this explosion of grief, and betook himself to soothing the young girl. J. E. Cooke, Virginia Comedians, I, vii.

Specifically—6. Fine or refined sensibility; fine emotional endowment; especially, tenderness or affectionateness of heart; susceptibility; in an adverse sense, sentimentality; as, a man of feeling; sometimes in the plural; as, to hurt or injure one's feelings.

It must be Willoughby, therefore, whom you suspect. But why? Is he not a man of honour and feeling? . . . Can he be deceitful? Jane Austen, Sense and Sensibility, xv.

7. Obscure or vague perception; belief the reasons for which are not clearly understood; as, every one had a feeling of the truth of this statement.

It thus appears that when pushed to our last resort, we must retire either upon feeling or belief, or both indifferently. See W. Hamilton.

8. Opinion or determination as founded on or resulting from emotion.

The feeling of the house could not be mistaken.
Macedon, Hist. Eng., vi.

The feeling of the Middle Ages evidently was that bare stone inside a building had an unfinished and uncomfortable look, and was quite as unsuitable in a richly decorated and furnished cathedral as it would now be considered in a lady's drawing-room. Encyc. Brit., XXIII, 158.

9. In the fine arts, the impression or emotion conveyed by the general expression of a work of art, or of some part or detail of it, especially as embodying a particular emotion or conception of the artist.

There can be little doubt that the Norman architects, with true Gothic feeling, always intended that their churches should eventually be vaulted, and prepared them accordingly, though in many instances they were constructed with wooden roofs, or compromises of some sort. J. Ferguson, Hist. Arch., I, 516.

Between the oak pilasters will be a carved panel of scroll ornament, Renaissance in feeling. Art Age, IV, 43.

The same fine feeling for greys charms us in both pictures. Athenaeum, Jan. 14, 1888, p. 56.

Era of good feeling. See era, = Syn. Thought, etc. See sensitment.

feeling (fē'ling), p. a. [Ppr. of *feol*¹, v.] 1. Possessing or affected by sensibility; easily affected or moved; experiencing emotion, especially that of sympathy or compassion; as, a feeling friend or advocate.

Thou art her brother,
And there must be a feeling heart within thee
Of her afflictions. Pletcher, Wife for a Month, iii, 2.

Yet no complaint before the Lady came;
The feeling servant spared the feeble dame.
Carbide, Works, I, 107.

Grievous and very much to be commiserated is the task of the feeling historian who writes the history of his native land. Lecky, Knickerbocker, p. 145.

2. Expressive of sensibility; manifesting emotion or earnestness; emotive; earnest; as, a feeling look or gesture; he spoke with feeling eloquence.

Frame some feeling line
That may discover such integrity.
Shak., 1. G. of V., iii, 2.

3. Exciting sensibility; deeply felt or realized; affecting. [Rare.]

This is yet a more feeling grief to us.
Scott, Tale of a Tub, i.

4. Sensibly felt or realized; emotionally experienced; vivid.

In whose hearts God hath written his law with his holy spirit, and given them a feeling faith of the mercy that is in Christ Jesus our Lord. Tyndale, Ans. to Sir T. More, etc.
[Parker Soc., 1850], p. 13.

I had a feeling sense
Of all your royal favours; but this last Strikes through my heart. Southern.

feelingly (fē'ling-ly), adv. 1. With feeling or expression of sensibility; tenderly; as, to speak feelingly.

When I see cause, I can both do and suffer, Freely and feelingly, as a true gentleman.
Pletcher, Wildgoose Chase, iv, 3.

They best can serve true gladness
Who meet most feelingly the calls of sadness.
Woodworth, Sonnets, iii, 55.

2. So as to be sensibly felt. [Rare.]

These are counsellors
That feelingly persuade me what I am.
Shak., As you like it, ii, 1.

feelh (fēlh), n. [< *feol*¹ + -th.] Feeling. Also felth. [Prov. Eng.] feer¹ (fēr), n. [Various written feer, fer, far, and even pher, etc.; < ME. fer, fer, far, < AS. ge-feran, a companion, associate, fellow; cf. feran, go on a journey, travel, go, ge-feran, intr. travel, go, tr. go (a journey), reach, get, < for, a journey (= OHG. fuara, MHG. fuare, furi, G. für, fahre, a going, journey, turn), < feran (= OHG. feran, etc.), go, fare; see far.] Cf. feldsher (feld'shēr), n. [< Russ. feld'shera = little Russ. felcher, < G. feldscher, feldscheer (cf. D. feldscheerder, Dan. fjeltskjær, Sw. fält-skär), an army surgeon, < feld, field, = E. field, + scherer, scheerer, barber, = E. shearer.] In Russia, a surgeon's assistant; a hospital orderly.

"What is this Feldsher?"

"He's an old soldier who dresses wounds and gives physic."

D. M. Wallace, Russia, p. 62.

feldspar (feld'spär), n. [A var. of feldspath, accented to E. spär.] In mineral, one of a very common group of closely related minerals, all silicates of aluminium, together with either calcium, sodium, potassium, or in one case barium. They crystallize in the monocline or triclinic system with closely similar angles. The prismatic angle is not far from 120°, and they have two easy cleavages which make an angle of 90°, or nearly 90°, with each other. Their specific gravity lies between 2.6 and 2.8, and their hardness between 6 and 7. In color they vary from clear and glassy to white, grayish, and light shades of yellow, red, or green, rarely darker green to black. They occur in distinct crystals, also in massive forms varying in structure from coarsely cleavable to granular-crystalline, compact, and hornstone-like. They form an essential constituent of many of the common crystalline rocks, as granite, gneiss, syenite, diorite, most kinds of basalt, andesite, trachyte, etc. The monoclinic feldspars are orthoclase and hyalophane. The former is a potash feldspar (see orthoclase), and is the commonest of the group; the latter is a baryta feldspar, and is a rare species. Closely related to orthoclase is the triclinic microcline (which see), having the same composition, but varying slightly in form. Besides these there are the triclinic (lime-soda) feldspars, called in general plagioclase, because of the oblique angle between their two cleavages, and forming a series varying progressively in composition, form, optical characters, and specific gravity from the lime feldspar anorthite to the sodium feldspar albite; the intermediate species are considered as isomorphous compounds of these two extremes in varying proportions. These ordinarily recognized are, named in order, labradorite, andesine, and oligoclase, the last approaching most closely to albite. The increase in soda in the members of the series is accompanied by an increase of silica, the species being increasingly acidic in the order named; thus, anorthite contains 43 per cent. of silica, and albite 69 per cent. The specific gravity diminishes in the series from anorthite (2.75) to albite (2.61). Certain triclinic feldspars containing considerable potash and with an angle of cleavage varying but little from 90° are sometimes grouped under the name orthoclase. Common feldspar, or orthoclase (and microcline), is much used in the manufacture of porcelain; some kinds are employed for ornaments, as aventurin feldspar or sunstone, also moonstone (an opalescent variety of orthoclase), albite or orthoclase, and, most of all, the species labradorite, beautiful for its play of colors. Also felspar.—Blue feldspar. Same as lazulite.—Glassy feldspar. See orthoclase.—Labrador feldspar. Same as labradorite.—Resplendent feldspar. Same as adularia or moonstone.

feldspath (feld'spāth), n. [< G. feldspath (= D. feldspāth = Dan. fjeldspat = Sw. fältspat), feldspar, < feld, = E. field, + spāth, spat, spar, M.H.G. spāt, laminated stone. The origin of G. spāth is unknown; a different word from E. spär, q. v.] Same as feldspar.

feldspathic (feld'spāth'ik), a. [< feldspath + -ic.] Pertaining to feldspar or containing it; an epithet applied to any mineral in which feldspar predominates. Also written felspathic.

Near the coast [of St. Helena] the rough lava is quite bare; in the central and higher parts feldspathic rocks, by their decomposition, have produced a clayey soil.

Darwin, Voyage of Beagle, ii. 286.

feldspathose (feld'spāth'ōs), a. [< feldspath + -ose.] Same as feldspathic.

feldyfar (fel'di-fär), n. An obsolete or dialectal variant of fieldfare. Maccgillivray.

fele¹, v. An obsolete spelling of *feel*¹.

fele³, v. t. An obsolete form of *feel*².

felevett, n. An obsolete form of velvet.

felfarer, n. An obsolete form of fieldfare.

Like a felfare frightened in winter by a birding-piece, I could settle nowhere.

Middleton, Anything for a Quiet Life, i. 1.

felfer (fel'fēr), n. A dialectal form of fieldfare. [Prov. Eng. (Lancashire).]

felfit (fel'fit), n. [A corruption of felfer.] The fieldfare; also, erroneously, the missel-thrush. [Prov. Eng.]

feliceps (fē'li-seps), n. [NL., < L. felis, a cat, + caput, head.] An old name of the eagle-owl or great owl of Europe, Bubo maximus. Barre, 1745.

Felician (fē'lish'an), n. [< Felix (Felice) + -ian.] A follower of Felix, Bishop of Urgel in the eighth century, chief propagator of the adoption heresy. See adoptionism.

felicific (fē'li-sif'ik), a. [< L. felix (felice), happy, + -ficus, < facere, make.] Making happy; productive of happiness.

No quality has ever been praised as excellent by mankind generally which cannot be shown to have some marked felicific effect, and to be within proper limits obviously conducive to the general happiness.

H. Sidgwick, Methods of Ethics, p. 457.

In such cases [violating duty to give pleasure to others], therefore, if the test of felicific consequences is to be applied, there is no doubt as to the result that it will yield.

T. H. Green, Prolegomena to Ethics, § 238.

felicify (fē'lis'i-fi), v. t. [< L. felix (felice), happy, + -ficare, < facere, make; see -fy.] To make happy; to felicitate. Quarles.

felicitate (fē'lis'i-tat), v. t.; pret. and pp. felicitated, pp. felicitating. [< L.L. felicitatus, pp. of felicitare (< It. felicitare = Pg. Spl. felicitar = F. féliciter), make happy, < L. felicitas (happiness; see felicity).] 1. To make happy. [Obsolete or rare.]

Gifts . . . felicitate lovers.

Lockhart (trans.), p. 76 (1664).

What a glorious entertainment and pleasure would all felicitate his spirit, if he could grasp all in a single survey.

Watts.

2. To congratulate; compliment upon a happy event; as, to felicitate a friend on his good fortune.

Tom felicitated himself and his partner of the watch on the result of their vigilance.

Buchanan, Ingoldsby Legends, I. 41.

Our travellers felicitated themselves upon falling into such good hands.

C. D. Warner, Their Pilgrimage, p. 29.

=Syn. 2. Congratulate, Felicitate. See congratulation.

felicitate (fē'lis'i-tat), a. [< L.L. felicitatus, pp.; see the verb.] Made happy.

I am alone felicitate.

In your dear highness love. Shak., Lear, i. 1.

felicitation (fē'lis-i-tā'shun), n. [= F. félicitation = Sp. felicitación = Pg. felicitagão = It. felicitazione, < L.L. as if felicitatio* (-us), < felicitare, make happy; see felicitate.] The act of felicitating; expression of joy for another's happiness or good fortune; congratulation.

How radiant and level the long Road of the Future seemed to open before him! Everywhere friends, prospects, felicitations.

Harper's Mag., LXXVI. 753.

=Syn. Congratulation, Felicitation. See congratulation.

felicitous (fē'lis'i-tus), a. [< felicity + -ous.]

1. Characterized by or conferring happiness or pleasure; highly pleasing. Hence—2. Well-chosen; appropriate; as, a felicitous manner; a felicitous situation; a felicitous reply.

Cowper has rendered his best service to English poetry by showing with what felicitous grace the blank verse lends itself to far other styles than the stately Milton movement.

J. C. Shairp, Aspects of Poetry, p. 131.

Syn. Fortunate, etc. (see happy); apt, pertinent, opportune, well-put.

felicitously (fē'lis'i-tus-ly), adv. In a felicitous manner; happily; appropriately; aptly.

On the part of Cambridge, of all men, it could certainly have demanded very little reflection to bethink himself of cases in which felicitously conveys one's meaning better than happily; the two words not being by any means synonymous, in the strict sense of the term.

Hall, Mod. Eng., p. 76.

felicitousness (fē'lis'i-tus-nes), n. The state or quality of being felicitous; appropriateness; aptness. Baile, 1727.

felicity (fē'lis'i-ti), n.; pl. felicities (-tiz). [< ME. feliche, feliche, < OF. feliche, F. félicité = Pr. felicitat = Sp. felicidad = Pg. felicidade = It. felicità, < L. felicitas (happiness, < felix (felice), happy, lucky, fortunate, in earlier sense fruitful, fertile, productive, *< √ fel, produce; see fecund, fitus.] 1. Happiness; bliss; blessedness; a blissful or happy state.

If thou didst ever hold me in thy heart,

Absent thee from felicity awhile,

And in this harsh world draw thy breath in pain,

To tell my story. Shak., Hamlet, v. 2.

A thing beloved

By earth and heaven, could she be Made for his sole felicity.

William Morris, Earthly Paradise, II. 36.

2. That which produces or promotes happiness; a felicitous circumstance or state of things; a source of happiness; most commonly in the plural.

Their high estates and felicities fell many times into most low and lamentable fortunes.

Porterham, Arte of Eng. Poesie, p. 26.

The felicities of her wonderful reign may be complete.

Ep. Athanas.

3. A skillful or happy faculty or turn; felicitous adroitness or propriety; a happy knack or choice; appropriateness; as, a rare felicity of phrase.

A painter may make a better face than ever was, but he must do it by a kind of felicity as a musician that maketh an excellent air in music, and not by rule.

Bacon, Beauty.

Bartholomew Dandridge, son of a house painter, had great business from his felicity in taking a likeness.

Walpole, Anecdotes of Painting, IV. in Re [Gray] had exquisite felicity of choice.

Lowell, Study Windows, p. 118.

Scarle fell into unceasing talk and exhaled his swarming impressions with a tender felicity, compounded of the oddest mixture of wisdom and folly.

H. James, Jr., Pass. Pilgrim, p. 104.

4. An appropriate or happy turn of thought or expression.

On the whole, of Byron's style it may be said that, if it has none of the subtle and curious felicities, in which some poets delight, it is yet language in its first intention, not reflected over or exquisitely distilled.

J. C. Shairp, Aspects of Poetry, p. 131.

Who will say that the uncommon beauty and marvellous English of the Protestant Bible is not one of the strongholds of heresy in this country . . . Its felicities often seem to be almost things rather than mere words.

F. W. Faber, quoted in Dial. Rev., June, 1853.

5. In astral, a favorable aspect.

But they wol caste yat thei have a fortunat planete in hir ascendent; and yat in his felicite, and than sey they yat it is wel.

Chaucer.

3. Aptness.

Felidae (fē'li-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Felis + -idae.]

The cat tribe; the typical family of feline or aduroid fissiped Fera, or terrestrial digitigrade carnivorous mammals. Their distinguishing characters are: normally retractile claws; palms and soles hairy; muzzle blunt, and profile of head declivous; teeth 28 or 30, with only one true molar in each jaw, of which the upper is small and tubercular and the lower setiform; premolars 2 or 3, canines 2; incisors 2; the skull with noisphenoid canal; the auditory bulla divided into two chambers; the paracrotal process close to the bulla; the mastoid process slight; the external auditory meatus short; intestines with a cecum; prostate and Cowper's glands present; and the penis-bone rudimentary. The domestic cat is a characteristic example, all the species having the same family traits and habits as well as structure. They are numerous, distributed over nearly all parts of the world excepting the Australian region, especially in temperate and tropical countries; none is common to the old and new worlds. The family is very homogeneous, and all the species were formerly included in the genus Felis. It includes, besides the common cat, the lion, tiger, jaguar, leopard, panther, cougar, ocelot, ounce, caracal, serval, lynx, cheetah, etc. The Felida are divisible into three subfamilies: Felinae, the true cats; Grogrinae, the hunting leopards; and Macharodontinae, the fossil saber-toothed tigers. See these words.

Skull of Cat, Felis domestica, showing the following bones: na, nasal; pm, premaxillary; p, parietal; sq, squamosal; sg, supraoccipital; oc, occipital; the line leads to the occipital condyle; h, tympanic bulla; my, stylomastoid foramen; mf, mental foramen; c, coronoid process of mandible; ar, angle of ramus of mandible; hr, horizontal ramus of mandible; an, angle of jaw.

Felinæ (fē'li-nē), n. pl. [NL., < Felis, q. v., + -inæ; see felina.] The true cats, a subfamily of Felida, containing all the living species excepting the cheetah, having perfectly retractile claws, the upper canines moderate and cylindrical, and the upper sectorial tooth with an antero-internal lobe. The group is coterminous with the genus Felis in a broad sense.

feline (fē'lin or -lin), a. and n. [= F. felis = Pg. It. felina, < L.L. felinus, of or belonging to a cat, < L. felis, a cat; see Felis.] 1. a. Cat-like in form or structure, as an animal; of or pertaining to the Felida, Felina, or genus Felis; typically aduroid.—2. Pertaining to or characteristic of animals of the cat tribe; cat-like in character or quality; resembling a cat in any respect; often applied to persons; as, feline softness of step; feline stealthiness, cruelty, or treachery.

His eyes were yellow, feline, and restless.

F. Watts, C. Cecil Dromedary.

II. n. One of the Felida or Felina, a feline or cat-like animal; in popular use, a domestic cat.

Over a hundred years ago it is said, a great battle of felina took place in the neighborhood of the town, which was participated in by all the cats in the city and county of Kilkenny, aided and abetted by cats from other parts of Ireland.

Amos, A. and Q., I. 29.

Felinia (fē'lin'i-ā), n. [NL., < L.L. felinus, cat-like; see felina.] A genus of noctuid moths, of the subfamily Remigina, with extraordinarily hairy legs, each of which appears as large as the abdomen: typified by F. spissa of India. Guinea, 1852.

felineity (fē-lin'j-ti), n. [< feline + -ity.] The feline quality: the quality of being cat-like in manner or disposition.

This idiosyncrasy of his felineity tormented Bella more than ever. M. Habicht, The Hidden Path, p. 342.

Felis (fē-lis), n. [NL. < L. felis, more commonly felines in Varro and Cicero felis in the best manuscripts, a cat; also applied to a marten, ferret, polecat; prob. < √ fē, produce, bear young; see felicity, ferunt, felus.] The cats as a genus; the typical genus of the family Felidae and subfamily Felinae; formerly coextensive with the family, now nearly the same as the subfamily, but excluding the lynxes, or still further restricted. The common wildcat of Europe is F. catinus, but probably not the original of the domestic varieties. See cat under Felidae.

felitomist (fē-lit'ō-mist), n. [< felitomy + -ist.] A dissector of cats. Wilder and Gage.

felitomy (fē-lit'ō-mi), n. [< L. felis, a cat, + cr. -omy, a cutting.] The dissection of cats.

Felitomy should be the stepping stone to anthropotomy. Wilder, New York Med. Jour., Oct., 1879, p. 6.

felk (felk), n. A dialectal variant of *felly*¹.

fell¹ (fel), v. t. [< ME. fallen (pret. felde, feld, pp. felde), cause to fall, cut down, strike down, prostrate, destroy, < AS. fellan, fyllan (pret. felde, fygde, pp. felled, cause to fall, cut down, strike down, etc. (= OS. fellian = OFries. fellan, falla = D. velen = OHG. fallen, MHG. velen, G. fallen = Icel. falla = Sw. fälla = Dan. falde, cause to fall), caus. of fallan, fall: see *fall*¹.]

1. To cause to fall; throw down; cut down; bring to the ground, either by cutting, as with ax or sword, or by striking, as with a club or the fist; as, to fell trees; to fell an ox; to fell an antagonist at fisticuffs.

There can a schrowde arwe out of the west,
That felde Roberts pryde.

Robyn and Gawayn (Child's Ballads, V. 40).

Cease your lamenting, Trojans, for a while,
And fell down Trees to build a Funeral Pile.

Conquerer, Iliad.

He ran boldly up to the Philistine, and, at the first throw, struck on the forehead, and felled him dead.

Kingsley.

He was not armed like those of eastern clime,
Whose heavy axes felled their heathen foe.

James Fenn, Poems, p. 151.

2. In sewing, to flatten on and sew down level with the cloth; as, to fell a seam.

Each, taking one end of the shirt on her knee, Again began working with hearty good-will,
Felling the seams, and whipping the frill.

Barham, Ingoldsby Legends, II. 126.

3. To finish the weaving of (a web, or piece of cloth). [Prov. Eng.] fell¹ (fel), n. [*< fell*¹, v.] 1. A cutting down; a felling.

In trees are always planted close together, because of keeping one another from the violence of the winds; and when a fell is made, they leave here and there a grown tree to preserve the young ones coming up.

Peggs, Diary, II. 73.

2. In sewing, a flat, smooth seam between two pieces of a fabric, made by laying down the wider of the two edges left projecting by the joining seam over the narrower edge and hemming it down. A French fell is made by doubling inward both edges of the fabric on the line of the joining seam, and making a second seam through the folds, so as to hold the edges in.

3. In weaving, the line of termination of a web in the process of weaving, formed by the last weft-thread driven up by the lay; the line to which the warp is at any instant wefted.

fell³ (fel), n. [< ME. fel, fell, < AS. fel, fell, a skin, hide, = OS. fel = OFries. fel = D. vel = OHG. fel, G. fell = Icel. fall and fell (only in comp.) = Sw. fall = Norw. feld, skin, hide, = Goth. fell (only in comp. threds-fell, leprosy) = L. pellis = Gr. pellos, a skin, hide. fellow-countryman (fel-ô-kun'tri-man), n. One belonging to the same country; a compatriot.

This has been censured as an American pleonasm, like play-actor, inasmuch as good English usage has conferred this meaning on the word countryman alone. Still, the want of a more definite expression has been felt in England as well as in this country; and the term fellow-countryman, as distinguished from countryman, rustic as the French compatriote and German landsmann are distinguished from paysan and landmann, has long been used in America, and in England has been adopted and sanctioned by such authorities as Southey and Lord Brougham.
Bartlett.

Yet for us, surely, fellow-countrymen have an especial interest.
Edinburgh Rev., CLXVI. 416.

fellow-craft (fel'ô-kraft), n. A freemason of the second rank; one above an entered apprentice and below a master-mason. Simmonds.

fellow-creature (fel-ô-kre'tür), n. A production of the same Creator; a sharer of the same animate existence; applied especially to mankind, but also extended to all animate existences. Also fellow-mortal.

Not a blessing teaches any one of us but by ordinances which provide for all fellow-creatures.
Channing, Perfect Life, p. 65.

We love him, praise him, just for this:
In every form and feature,
Through wealth and want, through woe and bliss,
He saw his fellow-creature!

O. W. Holmes, Barnes Centennial.

fellowess (fel'ô-ess), n. [< fellow + -ess.] A female fellow. Compare fellow, 6.

Whoe can have patience with such fellows and fellowesses?
Richardson, Clarissa Harlowe, III. 117.

Your bachelor uncles and maiden aunts are the most tantalizing fellows and fellowesses in the creation.
Miss Barrow, Camilla, ix. 5.

fellow-feel (fel-ô-fel'), v. t. [Developed from fellow-feeling.] To have a like feeling with; feel sympathy with; have fellowship in suffering with. [Rare.]

We should count her a very tender mother which should bear the pain twice and fellow-feel the infant's strivings and wrestlings the second time, rather than want the child.
D. Rogers, Naaman, p. 339.

fellow-feeler (fel-ô-fel'ër), n. One who has a fellow-feeling for another. [Rare.]

Am I not your fellow-feeler, as we may say, in all our miseries? Benn. and El., Knight of Burning Pestle, iii. 5.

fellow-feeling (fel-ô-fel'ing), n. A kindred feeling; feeling or suffering shared with another; joint interest; sympathy.

My heart is wring with pity and fellow-feeling, when I reflect what miseries must have been their lot.

English Gilds (E. E. T. S.), p. 313.

4. In arith., the rule of proportions by which the accounts of partners in business are adjusted, so that each partner may have a share of gain, or sustain a share of loss, in proportion to his part of the stock. It proceeds upon the principle established in the doctrine of proportion, that the sum of all the antecedents of any number of equal ratios is to the sum of all the consequents as any one of the antecedents is to its consequent.

5. (a) A station of privilege and emolument in English colleges which entitles the holder (called a fellow) to a share in their revenues. In Oxford and Cambridge the fellowships were either constituted by the original founders of the colleges to which they belong, or they have been since endowed. In almost all cases their holders must have taken at least the first degree of bachelor of arts, or of students in the civil law. Fellowships vary in value from about £50 to £250 a year and upward, and they all confer upon their holders the right to apartments in the college, and certain privileges as to commons or meals. Though many fellowships are tenable for life, in general they are forfeited upon attainment by the holder of a certain position in the church or at the bar, or upon his marriage. In this last case, however, a fellow may retain his fellowship by a special vote of the college. Except in the single case of Downing College, Cambridge, where graduates of Oxford and Cambridge are eligible, fellowships are confined to graduates of the university to which they belong. (b) In colleges and universities of the United States, a scholarship or sum of money granted for one or more years to a graduate student to enable him to pursue his studies either at that college or university or abroad.

The friends of university training can do nothing that would forward it more than the founding of post-graduate fellowships.
Lowell, Harvard University.

Good fellowship, companionableness; fondness and fitness for social intercourse; a festive or sociable disposition.

He had by his excessive good fellowship . . . made himself popular with all the officers of the army.
Clarendon, Great Rebellion.

Right hand of fellowship, the right hand given in installation and ordination services by a minister to the minister about to be installed or ordained in token of the fellowship of the churches, as practised by some Protestant denominations. It has a very early origin, being probably derived in the primitive church (Gal. ii. 9) from a similar custom among the Persians and Parthians (Jew. Antiq. 18. 9. § 3) who practised it in treaties, as constituting an inviolable pledge of fidelity.

When James, Cephas, and John . . . perceived the grace that was given unto me, they gave to me and Barnabas the right hands of fellowship.
Gal. ii. 9.

The elder desired of the churches that, if they did approve them to be a church, they would give them the right hand of fellowship.
Winthrop, Hist. New England, I. 21.

fellowship (fel'ô-ship), v. i. pret. and pp. fellowshipped, pp. fellowshipping. Merlin (E. E. T. S.), ii. 157.

felt¹ (felt), n. [*< ME. felt, < AS. felt = D. vill = LG. fitt = OHG. MHG. G. filz = Sw. Dan. filt, felt; hence (< LG.) ML. feltum, filtrum, > It. feltro = Sp. feltro = Pr. feutre = OF. feutre, feutre, F. feutre = MGr. φύτρον; felt; see feltter and feltter, and feltter.] 1. An unwoolen fabric of short hair or wool, or of wool and fur, agglutinated or matted together, with the aid usually of moisture and heat, by rolling, beating, and pressure. The property of felting results chiefly from the serrated or jagged structure of wool and most hairs, as well as from the crimped or wavy form natural to some animal fibers. The making of felt is thought to have originated at a very early date in the western part of Asia, and the best and most durable felt is still made in Persia and the neighboring countries. Felt floor mats an inch or more thick and of admirable texture and printed in rich designs in color are used upon marble and tiled floors in Persia. (See unwoolen.) In Europe, throughout the middle ages and later, felt was a usual material for hats, and was also used for stuffing or bonesteading garments for both defense and fashion. Felt is now in general use not only for hats, but for clothing and upholstery, carpets, table-covers, and mats, jackets for steam-boilers, etc., and lining for roofs and walls. Broadcloth and other filled woolen fabrics are partially felted by the process of fulling; and the familiar shrinkage of woolen garments in washing results from an unsought felting, which draws the fibers of the fabric closer together.*

Howbeit, they are of discretion to make feltes of Camels haire, wherewith they clothe themselves, and which they holde against the winde. Hakluyt's Voyages, I, 57.

3. A thick matted growth of weeds, spreading by their roots. [Prov. Eng.]—4. Felt; skin.

To know whether sheep are sound or not, see that the felt be loose. Mortimer, Husbandry.

Adhesive felt. See adhesive.—Felt carpet. See carpet.—Lining-felt. (a) In building, a coarse felt placed between two layers of boards or on the inside surface of a wall, to deaden sound or as a non-conductor of heat. A coarse heavy paper, often saturated with tar, is much used for the same purpose. See lining-paper, and tarred paper, under paper. (b) A fabric made of hair, or asbestos and hair, sometimes saturated with a lime cement, used on steam-pipes and boilers as a non-conducting covering. (c) A compound of liquid cement and animal or vegetable fiber, applied with a brush for the same purpose. — Paper-makers' felt, a coarse, twilled, loosely woven material, neither teased nor shorn, used in paper-manufacture to place between wet sheets. — Roofing-felt, a material similar to lining-felt, used as a covering for roofs. This material is usually not a true felt, but an agglutination of hair or other animal fibers, compounded with a preparation of tar, and rolled into sheets. It is nailed down upon the roof in overlapping strips, and is usually coated subsequently with tar, or some special heavy pigment having tar or asphalt as a basis and commonly called caoutchouc.

aspera, along its posterior surface, bearing upon its upper extremity, by an oblique neck, a hemispherical head, and two trochanters, the greater and the lesser, and expanding below into two large condyles, the inner and the outer, both of which articulate with the tibia, but neither with the fibula. The slenderness of the bone is beyond an average for mammals, though in some it is still slenderer. Many femora, as of the horse, develop a third trochanter, and also may articulate with both bones of the leg. The reception of the head of the femur in the acetabulum is such that it articulates above with all three of the pelvic bones, the ilium, the ischium, and the pubis. In birds the greater trochanter abuts against the ilium, and thus enters into the formation of the hip-joint. See also cuts under digitigrade, Dromæus, and Icthyomysauria.

3. In entom., the thigh; the third joint of the leg, between the trochanter and the shank or tibia. See ent under corbiculum.—4. In arch., the interstitial member between two channels in the triglyph of the Doric order.

fen¹ (fēn), n. [ME. fēn, fenne, a fen, marsh, bog, mud, < AS. fēn, fenn, rarely spelled fān, fann, a fen, marsh, bog, mud, = OFries. fenne, fene = D. veen = OHG. fenni, fī, fenn = Leel. fēn, a fen, bog, = Goth. fani, mud. 3. A disease affecting hops, caused by a quick-growing moss or mold. Imp. Dict. = Syn. 1. Swamp, etc. See marsh.

fen² (fēn), v. t. [A corruption of *fend*¹.] To forbid: same as *fend*¹; used in this form by boys in marbles and other games, in an exclamatory way, to check or block, according to understood rules, some move of an opposing player. It occurs in such phrases as "fen roundings!"—that is, I forbid moving around in a circle (as a player might otherwise do in order to avoid some obstruction), "fen dubs!"—that is, I forbid doubles (said when a player knocks two marbles out of the ring, one of which must then be put back). The phrase is properly used only by the opposing player, but through ignorance of its real meaning it may be used also by the player who knocks the marbles out, who thereby cuts off the opponent's right to object, and pockets both marbles.

"Go before me, and show me all those dreadful places." . . . "I am fly," says Jo. "But fen larks, you know. Stow hooking it!" Dickens, Black House, xvi.

Our own experience has taught us, nevertheless, that additional fences against these dangers ought not to be omitted.

D. Webster, Speech, March 10, 1828.

He hath no fence when Gardiner questions him;

All oozes out. Tennyson, Queen Mary, i. 4.

2. An inclosure round a yard, field, or other tract of ground, or round or along the sides of any open space, as part of a large room, a bridge, etc. Specifically, a fence for land is understood, especially in the United States, to be a line of posts and rails or wire, or of boards or pickets; but the term is applicable to a wall, hedge, ditch or trench, bank, or anything that serves to guard against unrestricted ingress and egress, to obstruct the view, or merely as a tangible dividing line. By American statutes, boundary-fences between adjoining owners are usually required to be 4 feet high (in some states 4½), and in good repair, and to consist of a suitable structure, or to be a watercourse or other barrier which the fence-viewers having jurisdiction shall deem sufficient.

There is an innumerable multitude of very handsome bridges, all of a single arch, and without any fence on either side, which would be a great inconvenience to a city less sober than Venice.

Addison, Remarks on Italy (ed. Bohm), I. 388.

Never peep beyond the thorny bound

Or oaken fence that hems the paddock round.

Cowper, Table Talk, l. 583.

Like three horses that have broken fence,

And glutted all night long breast deep in corn.

Tennyson, Princess, ii.

Some horses, good performers over any other description of fence, will not jump water under any circumstances.

Engel. Brit., XII. 197.

3. A guard, guide, or gage designed to regulate or restrict the movement of a tool or machine.

—4. An arm or a projection in a lock which enters the gates of the tumblers when they are adjusted in proper position and coincidence, and at other times prevents such movement of the dog or other obstructing member as would allow the bolt to be retracted. E. H. Knight.

—5. The arm of the hammer-spring of a gun-lock. E. H. Knight.—6. The art of self-defense, especially by the sword; fencing; skill in fencing or sword-play; hence, skill in argument and repartee, especially adroitness in defending one's position and baffling an opponent's attacks.

I bruised my shin the other day with playing at sword and dagger with a master of fence.

Enjoy your dear wit, and gay rhetoric,

That hath so well been taught her dazzling fence.

Milton, Comus, l. 791.

7. A purchaser or receiver of stolen goods; the keeper of a place for the purchase or reception of stolen goods, or the place itself.

What have you got to say for yourself, you withered old fence, eh?

Dickens, Oliver Twist, xxvix.

The landlady of the "Three Rooks" was a notorious fence, or banker of thieves.

Thackeray, Catherine, vii.

8. An inclosure in which fish are dried, cured, and prepared. — Cap of fence. See cap. — Coat of fence. See coat. — Doublet of fence. See doublet. — Gun fence, a fence built of rails, with one end resting upon the ground, the other supported by two crossed stakes. — Ring fence, a fence which encircles unbrokenly a large area, as that of a whole estate. — Snake fence, a fence made of split rails laid zigzag, with the ends resting on each other, and often supported by rough posts in pairs driven slantingly into the ground. Also called stake-and-ridge fence, Virginia rail fence, worm fence. [F. S.] — Sunk fence, a fence built in an artificial or natural depression of the ground, as a ditch or a watercourse, so that it does not project above the general surface.

They [rooks] flew over the lawn and grounds to alight in a great meadow, from which these were separated by a sunk fence.

Charlotte Brontë, Jane Eyre, xi.

To be on the fence, to be uncertain or undecided (as if astride of a fence, hesitating on which side to descend), as between two opinions; be neutral or undecided, as between parties or persons. [F. S.]

Every fool knows that a man represents

Not the feller that sent him, but them on the fence—

Impartially ready to jump either side.

And make the first use of a turn of the tide.

Lowell, Biglow Papers, 1st ser., iv.

Wire fence, a fence made of parallel strands of wire, generally galvanized, attached to posts placed at suitable distances, and tightened. Wire-fences have to a large extent superseded the more cumbersome forms formerly in use. See barbed wire, under barbed.

fence (fens), v.; pret. and pp. fenced, ppr. fencing. [ME. fencen, fensen; abbr. of defence, q. v.] 1. trans. 1. To defend; guard; hem in.

The Chinese have no hats, caps, or turbans; but when they walk abroad, they carry a small umbrella in their hands, wherewith they fence their head from the sun or the rain, by holding it over their heads.

Dampier, Voyages, I. 467.

The man that uttered this

Had perished without God, be it who it will.

But for this arm, that fenced him from the foe.

Fiann*, pl. Fianna; see def. 1.] 1. n. 1. A modern English form of Irish Fiann, Fianna, a name applied in Irish tradition to the members of certain tribes who formed the militia of the ardrigh or king (see ardrigh) of Eire or Erin (the Fianna Eirionn, or champions of Erin). The principal figure in the Fenian legends is Fionn or Finn, who figures as Fingal in the Ossianic publications of McPherson, in which the name of Ossian stands for Oisín, son of Finn. The Fenians, with their hero Finn, while probably having a historical basis, became the center of a great mass of legends, which may be compared with the legends of King Arthur and the Round Table. In the Ossianic version the Fenians are warriors of superhuman size, strength, speed, and prowess. Also Fian, Fion.

2. A member of an association of Irishmen known as the Fenian Brotherhood, founded in New York in 1857, with a view to secure the independence of Ireland. The movement soon spread over the United States and Ireland (where it absorbed the previously existing Phoenix Society), and among the Irish population of Great Britain, and several attempts were made at insurrection in Ireland, and at invasion of Canada from the United States. The association was organized in district clubs called circles, presided over by centres, with a head center as chief president and a general secretary; an organization afterward modified in some respects. Between 1863 and 1872 eleven "national congresses" were held by the Fenian Brotherhood in the United States, after which it continued in existence as a secret society.

The animal lives in burrows like other foxes, and is chiefly nocturnal in habits. There are several species of the genus Fennecus.

2. A misnomer of an entirely different African fox, of the genus Megalogale or Otocyon.

Fennecus (fēn'ek-us), n. [NL. < fennec.] A genus of small African foxes with very large ears and auditory bullae, belonging to the alopecoid or vulpine series of the family Canidae, and containing the fennecs or zerdas, as F. zerda, F. fanchiens, and F. chima. See fennec.

fennek, n. See fennec.

fennel (fēn'el), n. [< ME. fenel, fynel (also in another form finkel, finkel, > mod. finkel, after D. or Scand.); < AS. fenol, usually finol, finch, finol, rarely finagle, = D. fenkel = OHG. fūndal, finichal, finichal, G. fenichel = Sw. fenkel = Dan. fenikel = OF. fenol, F. fenouil = Fr. fenouil, fenouil = Sp. hinojo = Pg. fancha = It. fanchio, < L. feniculum, more correctly faniculum, fennel, dim. of fenum, more correctly fanum, hay; see fenugreek.] 1. An aromatic umbelliferous plant, Foeniculum vulgare, a native of southern Europe and common in cultivation. It is a tall, glaucous herb with decomposed leaves, yellow flowers, an agreeable odor, and sweet aromatic taste. Several varieties are extensively cultivated in Europe, America, and India for their seeds, which are used in medicine as a carminative and stimulant. The dried con-simphon, however, is in veterinary practice. The oil distilled from the seeds is used in the manufacture of cordials.

The fennel wol up growe.

So it be gladd.

Palladius, Husbandrie (E. E. T. S.), p. 84.

There's fennel for you, and columbines.

Shak., Hamlet, iv, 5.

Above the lowly plants it towers,

The fennel, with its yellow flowers,

And in an earlier age than ours

Was gitted with the wondrous powers,

Lost vision to restore.

Longfellow, Goblin of Life.

2. A name of certain plants of other genera. See below. Dog-fennel. See dog-fennel. Giant fennel, the Ferula communis. Hog- or sow-fennel, the Penicillium officinale. Sweet fennel, Foeniculum dulce, sometimes eaten as a vegetable or salad. To eat conger and fennel, to eat two high and hot things together, esteemed an act of libertinism. Nares.

Because their legs are both of a bigness; and he plays at quots well; and cat-conger and fennel.
Shak., 2 Hen. IV., ii, 4.

fennel-flower (fēn'el-flōr'), n. The Nigella Damascena, or ragged-lady, also N. arvensis, the seeds of which are used in the East as a condiment, and medicinally as a carminative and diuretic.

fennel-water (fēn'el-wā'tēr), n. A spirituous liquor prepared from fennel-seed.

Fennian (fē-ni-an), n. and a. Same as Fenian, 1.

fennish (fēn'ish), a. [< fen + -ish.] Full of fens; fenmy; marshy.

Hardier putrified and corrupted than all the fennish waters in the whole country. Whitgift, Defence, p. 578.

fenny (fēn'i), a. [< ME. fenny, < AS. fennig, fenny, marshy, muddy, < fenn, fen, marsh, mud; see fen. Cf. fenny.] 1. Having the character of a fen; boggy; marshy.

Much of this parke, as well as a greate part of the country about it, is very fenny, and the ayre very bad.
Earl of, Diary, O. C. I, 21, 1644.

feretrum (fēr'e-trum), n.; pl. *fe-

Feretrum.
English medieval silverwork.

ML.: see feretor, feretory.] Same as feretory, ferforth, adv. Same as far-forth. Chaucer.

fergusonite (fēr'gu-sun-ī), n. [After Robert Ferguson, of Raith, Scotland.] A brownish-black mineral consisting mainly of molic acid and yttria, and crystallizing in the tetragonal system. It occurs in quartz near Cape Farewell, Greenland; also in Sweden, Massachusetts, and North Carolina.

feria (fēr'i-ā), n. [L.: see feria, feria.] In the Roman Catholic ecclesiastical calendar, any day of the week from Monday to Friday, inclusive—that is, any day but the Jewish and the Christian sabbath: as, feria secunda, tertia, etc.
[This use constitutes a reversal of the original meaning of the word of which there appears to be no adequate explanation. See feriae.]

The regular rotation of fast and feast, vigil and feria, in the calendar. Euseb. Hist., XVI, 510.

feriæ (fēr'i-ē), n. pl. [L.: see feria and feriæ.]

In Rom. antiq., holidays during which free Romans suspended their political transactions and lawsuits, and slaves enjoyed a cessation of labor. The feriæ were thus dies nefasti. They were divided into two classes, feriæ publicæ and feriæ privæ.
The latter were observed by single families or individuals in commemoration of some particular event of consequence to themselves or their ancestors. Feriæ publicæ included all days on which public religious festivals were held, whether stated (feriæ stativæ or stativæ) or occurring every year, but not on fixed days, the precise dates being appointed each time by the magistrates (feriæ conceptivæ), or ordered by the consuls, pretors, or dictator, with special reference to some particular emergency (feriæ impetrativæ).
The manner in which the public feriæ were kept bears great analogy to the modern observance of Sunday, the people visiting the temples of the gods and offering prayers and sacrifices.

ferial (fēr'i-āl), a. [< ME. feryalle, < OF. feriale, F. feriale = Pr. Sp. Pg. ferial = It. feriale, < ML. ferialis, feria, a holiday: see feria and feriæ.] 1. Pertaining to holidays (feriæ), or to public days: specifically, in Scotland, formerly applied to those days on which it was not lawful for courts to be held or any judicial step to be taken.

It hath be vsid, the Maire and Shiref of Bristowe to kepe theire due residence at the Counter every feriall

In feriell tyme serve chese sharped with sugnar and saunge-levis. Babees Book (E. E. T. S.), p. 372.

It was the settled policy of the empire for the emperor thus to determine concerning ferial days. Pap. Sci. Mo., XXX, 11.

2. Eccles., pertaining to any day of the week which is not appointed for a specific fast or festival. Whether a day is ferial or not depends upon whether any specific service is appointed for it. See note under feria.—Ferial use, church music used on ordinary occasions, and having no special festal or penitential character: opposed to festal use, the music used on festal days.
feriation (fēr'i-ā'shon), n. [*< L. as if feriatio
(n.), < feriarī (> It. feriare = Sp. Pg. feriar = OF. ferier), keep holiday, < ferie, holidays.]
The act of keeping holiday: cessation from work.

Why should the Christian church have lesse power than the Jewish synagoge? here was not a mere prædication, but a feasting. Ep. Hall, The Pool of Bethesda.

As though there were any feriation in nature, this season is commonly termed the physician's vacation. Sir T. Browne.

ferier, n. [ME. ferie, ferge, a holiday, < OF. ferie, ferie, ferie, F. ferie = Sp. Pg. It. feria (cf. D. G. ferien = Dan. Sw. ferier, pl., vacation), < L. feria, feria, ML. in sing. feria, a holiday; cf. feriæ, which is the same word with vernacular (OF., etc.) development, while feria, etc., is a mere reflex of the L. form.] A holiday; a stated feast-day.

Vch day is holiday with hym or an heigh ferge:
And if he angte wote here it is an harlotes tonge.
Piers Plowman (B), xiii, 413.

These ben the feries of the Lord, whiche ye schulen ferine (fēr'in or -rīn), a. and n. [= OF. ferin = Sp. Pg. It. ferino, < L. ferinus, < fera, a wild animal: see fera, feral, and ferer.] 1. a. 1. Wild:

in a state of nature; never having been domesticated.

The only difficulty . . . is touching those ferine, noxious, and untamable beasts, as lions, tigers, wolves, bears.
Sir M. Hale, Orig. of Mankind, p. 202.

The beasts . . . are not truly wild, yet they live in the manner of wild beasts, that are feral, not ferine.
A. Newton, Zoologist, 3d ser. (1855), vii, 101.

2. Malignant; noxious: as, a ferine disease.
Doughison.

II. n. A wild beast; a beast of prey.

ferinely (fēr'in-li), adv. In the manner of wild beasts. Craig.

ferineness (fēr'in-nes), n. Wildness; savage-ness.

A conversation with those that were fallen into a more barbarous habit of life and manners would easily assimilate, at least, the next generation to barbarism and ferineness. Sir M. Hale, Orig. of Mankind, p. 197.

Feringee, Feringhee (fēr-ing'gē), n. [Hind. Farangi = Pers. Farangi = Ar. Farānī, Afrānī, a European; formed, with the relational suffix
-ī, < Hind. Farang = Pers. Farang, a European; a corruption of Frank.] A Frank; a European; specifically, among the Hindus, an Englishman.

The first installment of these notorious cartridges . . . were without doubt abundantly offensive to the Feringee as well as to the faithful. Capt. M. Thomson.

ferio (fēr'i-o), n. The mnemonic name of that mood of the first figure of syllogism of which the major premise is negative and the minor particular. The following is an example: No birds are viviparous; but some marine animals are birds; hence, some marine animals are not viviparous. The word is one of the names invented in the thirteenth century and attributed to Petrus Hispanus. The three vowels, e, i, o, indicate the quantity and quality of the three propositions. See barbara.

ferison (fēr'i-sou), n. The mnemonic name of that mood of the third figure of syllogism which has one of the premises particular and the other negative. The following is an example: No placental mammals lay eggs; some placental mammals are tinned; therefore, some tinned animals do not lay eggs. The word is one of the names of moods invented in the thirteenth century and attributed to Petrus Hispanus. The three vowels, e, i, o, indicate the quantity and quality of the three propositions, namely, universal negative, particular affirmative, particular negative. The f shows that the mood is to be reduced to ferio, the s that the minor premise is simply converted in the reduction.

ferity (fēr'i-ti), n. [= OF. ferite, fierte, violence, boldness, audacity, F. fierte, pride, = It.
feridà, < L. feribit (-s), wildness, < ferus, wild, savage: see feral, ferre.] Wildness; savage-ness; cruelty.

The ferity of such minds holds no rule in retaliations.
Sir T. Browne, Christ. Mor., iii, 12.

The evil of his heart is but like the ferita and wildness of lions' whelps. J. Taylor, Works (ed. 1835), I, 504.

Forgiving the ferity of their nature, become civilized to all his employments. Erasmus, Sylva.

Even in rugged Scotland, nature is scarcely wilder than a mountain sheep, certainly a good way short of the ferity of the mouse and catibon. The Century, XXVII, 111.

ferkt, v. See ferk.

ferlicht, a. and adv. See ferly.

ferlingt, n. [Also written farling (cf. *farl*², *far-del*², farthel); ult. < AS. færling, a fourth part, a farthing: see farthing.] 1. In old law, a fourth; a fourth part; a quarter; a farthing.
Specifically—2. A quarter of a ward or borough.

In King Edward the Confessor's time . . . there were in this borough four Ferlings, that is, Quarters or Wards.
Holland, tr. of Camden's Britain, p. 557.

ferling-noble (fēr'ling-nō-bl), n. The quarter-noble, an English gold coin. See quarter-noble.
ferly, farly (fēr'li, fār'li), a. and n. [Also written ferle, farle; < ME. ferly, ferli, ferlich,

All the folk that with him ware War ful lene of this ferly fare.
Hoby Redd (E. E. T. S.), p. 129.

[Obsolete or prov. Eng. and Scotch in all senses.]

II. n. 1. A wonder; a strange deed, event, or object.

And ere I cam to the court . . .
Many ferly me by fel in a fewe yeris.
Piers Plowman (A), xii, 75.

Ha! where ye gaun, ye crawlin' ferlie?
Burns, To a Louse.

Ferly is properly a wonder, but it is also used to express any sight, incident, or event that is unusual or that attracts attention; thus, two friends meeting will say
"let us walk thro' the town and see the ferlies."
Destruction of Troy, p. 40, note 8.

2. Wonder; astonishment.

Bot I had gret ferly, that I fynd no man
That has writen in story how Hanchok this lond won.
Robert of Brunne, p. 25.
Flourance of that fare thanne gret ferly hadde.
William of Palerne (E. E. T. S.), l. 4531.

When Achilles the choise maiden with chere can behold,
He hade ferly of hir fairhede, & fell into thoght.
Destruction of Troy (E. E. T. S.), l. 9144.

3. A fault. [Obsolete or prov. Eng. and Scotch in all senses.]

ferlyt, farlyt, adv. [< ME. ferly, ferli, < AS. færlie, suddenly, < færlie, sudden: see ferly, a.]

1. Fearfully; singularly; wonderfully.

He come to speke with one holi
Ferly him thought that seche was sory.
King Horn (E. E. T. S.), p. 81.

2. Suddenly; hastily; quickly.

Ferly he aperide not. Wyclif, 2 Ki. ix, 30 (Oxf.).
The rain . . . ferly theyd that folk.
Allegorical Poems (ed. Morris), ii, 990.

fermacy, n. [ME., < OF. farmacia: see phar- macy.] A medicine; healing drink.

Fermentages of herbes. Chaucer, Knight's Tale, l. 1875.

fermail (fēr-māl'), n. [OF., also fermeil, fer-mal (ML. reflex firmalius, firmalus, etc.); < ML. firmaculum, a clasp, < firmare, make firm: see firm, v.] A clasp or catch for mail or costume; same as agraffe, 1.

fermary, n. See fermy.

fermata (fēr-mā'tā), n. [It., a pause, stop, rest, < firmare, stop, fix, prevent, confirm, < L. firmare, make firm, strengthen, < firmus, firm: see firm, a.] In music: (a) A pause or break; especially, in a concerto, a pause in the accompaniment to give room for an extended cadenza by the soloist. (b) A hold or pause upon a tone or chord, the length being discretionary with the performer or conductor. (c) The sign \frown or \smile placed over or under a note or even a bar to indicate such a hold or pause. See *hold*¹.

Fermatian (fēr-mā'shi-an), a. Pertaining to the French mathematician Pierre de Fermat (1601-65).—Fermatian reasoning, reasoning in the following form: "A certain character, P, if possessed by any one of a linear series of subjects, is necessarily possessed by the next following subject; now, the character P is possessed by the first subject of the series, ergo it is possessed by all the subjects." The discovery of this form of reasoning by Fermat opened the theory of numbers to the researches of mathematicians. It holds good even if the series is infinite, so long as it contains no member which cannot be reached by proceeding by successive steps from the first member; as is the case, for example, with the entire class of finite positive integer numbers.
In this particular Fermatian reasoning is contrasted, for example, with the syllogism of transposed quantity, which holds only for finite classes. On the other hand, the Fermatian inference fails in such a case as the following: If Achilles, pursuing a tortoise, is behind it at any instant, then he will still be behind it when he reaches the point where the tortoise now is; but he is behind it at first; therefore, he will always be behind it. The following is equally absurd: If any whole number is finite, the next greater whole number is finite; but 1 is finite; hence all whole numbers are finite.

fermet, n. An obsolete variant of fermal.

ferment (fēr'ment), n. [= F. ferment = Sp.

boiling, or the internal motion of the constituent parts of a fluid. [Rare.]—2. That which is capable of causing fermentation. Ferments are of two kinds, organized and unorganized. Organized ferments belong to the lowest order of microscopic fungi, (see fermentation). Unorganized or chemical ferments are substances capable of causing chemical changes in certain other substances without themselves being permanently changed in the process: as diastase, maltin, and ptyalin.

fern¹ (fĕrn), n. [< ME. ferne, < AS. fearn = D. farum = OHG. farn, faran, farum, farm, MHG. *rarn, rarn, G. farn (incomp. farn-kraut), fern; perhaps akin to Serv. Bulg. Bohem. paprat = Pol. paprot = Russ. paproti = Lith. papartis, fern. Some compare Skt. parva, wing, feather, leaf, tree (applied to various plants); the same connection of thought appearing in the Gr. πτερος, a fern, πτερος, a wing, feather, = E. feather.] One of a large group of vascular cryptogamous plants, constituting the natural order Filices. They are herbaceous, rarely shrubby or arborescent plants, sometimes with long creeping rhizomes. But in many cases the rootstock or caudex is erect, when the species is called a tree fern. The fructification, which is asexual, consists of spores produced in sporangia upon the backs or margins of the fronds. The sporangia in most genera are collected in definite clusters (sori), and these are usually covered by a special covering membrane, or one formed from the margin of the frond, called an indusium. Each sporangium is formed from a single epidermal cell. In the largest suborder, the Polypodiaceae, the sporangia are stalked and provided with a vertical, many-jointed ring, which ruptures at maturity, allowing the escape of the spores. In the other suborders the ring is less perfectly developed, or wanting. The spores in germination produce a green prothallium upon the surface of the soil, and upon the under surface of the prothallium antheridia and archegonia are monoclously produced. After fertilization the germ-cell of the archegonium develops into a frond-bearing plant. About 2,500 species of ferns are known. They are found all over the world, but abound in humid temperate and tropical regions.

Little known Ferrarese painters.

Quarterly Rev., CXIV, 119.

II. n. A native or an inhabitant of Ferrara. ferrary, (fer-à-ri), n. [< L. ferraria, an iron-mine, iron-works, fem. of ferrarius, of iron: see farrier, farricary.] The art of working in iron; iron-working.

And thus resolv'd to Lemnos she doth hie,
Where Vulcan works in heavenly ferrarie, Hesperus, Troja Britannica, I, 1609.

ferrate (fer-āt), n. [< L. ferrum, iron, + *-ate*¹.] In chem., a salt formed by the union of ferric acid with a base.

ferray, n. An obsolete form of foray.

ferret, adv. and a. See *far*¹.

ferrean (fer-ē-an), a. [As ferric + -an.] Same as ferric.

ferrel (fer-ēl), n. See *ferrule*².

ferric (fer-ē-us), a. [= Sp. Pg. It. ferrico, < L. ferrus, made of iron, iron, < ferrum, iron.] I. Of, pertaining to, or of the nature of iron; made of iron.

A weak and inanimate kind of load-stone, veyned here and there with a few magnetical and ferric lines.
Sir T. Browne, Vulg. Err., ii, 3.

2. In geom., of a metallic-gray hue, like that of polished iron.

ferric¹, a. and adv. compar. See *far*¹.

ferric², n. See farrier.

ferric³, n. [ME., only in barell ferrers, pl. (prop. a compound), < barell, barrel, + ferrer, < OF. ferrere, a leather bottle or bucket, < ML. ferraria, ferraria (also ferrata, ferratum), a bucket with iron hoops, fem. of L. ferrarius, of iron, < ferrum, iron. Cf. farrier. Barell ferraris is translated in ML. as cudi-ferrus, i. e., in acc. cudos ferrus, iron-bound casks.] A cask or barrel with iron hoops. [Prov. Eng.]

Barell ferrers they brought and brought the wyne.
Morte Arthur (E. E. T. S.), I, 2745.

ferret¹ (fer-ēt), n. [Early mod. E. also ferrette; < ME. ferch, ferette, ferel, also foret, forette, for-ytt, later forette (the vowel e in first syllable is due to the lack of stress—the word being accented in ME. on the second syllable—or perhaps to simulation of L. fera, a wild animal) (= MD. fuert, foret, ferret, fret, D. fret = G. frett, usually in dim. fretchen), < OF. faret, F. furet = It. furetto, < ML. furcetus, also spelled furectus (also, after OF., foretta), a ferret, a dim. of the earlier ML. furca), a ferret (> OSp. furca, Sp. huron = Pg. furão = OF. furca, a ferret), these names, as well as ML. furcubus, furcubus, furcus, being applied to the ferret and other animals of the weasel kind, in allusion to their slyness and craftiness, < L. fur, a thief, dim. furculinus, a petty thief. Cf. AS. meurth, a marten, glossed by ML. furca(n)s, furcubus, and furcubus. The W. furca, a ferret, which rests on fur, wary, wily, crafty, wise, = Bret. fur, crafty, wise, may have been suggested (with its verb glaredu, ferret out) by the E. and Rom. forms. Other alleged Celtic forms do not appear. 1. An artificial albinotic variety of the fitch or polecat, Putorius vulgaris or fo-

other vermin or small game living in holes, into which its lithe, slender, and simious body readily enters. The ferret is also called Putorius furo, and is by some considered a species; it is now known only as a domesticated animal. It is a near relative of the stoat or ermine and the weasel, as well as of the polecat. See these words, and Mustelidae, Putorius.

As from the Berries in the Winter's night

The Keeper draws his Ferret (drest to bite).

Sylvestor, tr. of Du Bartas's Weeks, ii., The Decay.

2. In glass-manuf., the iron used to try the melted matter to see if it is fit to work, and to make the rings at the mouths of bottles.

ferret¹ (fer-ēt), v. t. [*< ME. fereten, fyrretten, < OF. furter, F. furter, hunt with a ferret, ferret, search, ransack, = It. ferettare, furettare (obs.), ferret or hunt in holes, grope, fumble; from the noun.] 1. To drive out of a lurking-place, as a ferret does the rabbit.

With an otter spare ryner none ne ponde,
With hem that fyrretth robe conyngherthys [rabbit-burrows]. Political Poems, etc. (ed. Furnivall), p. 26.

Having received sundry complaints against these invisible workmen, I ordered the proper officer of my court to ferret them out of their respective caves, and bring them before me.

Addison, Trial of the Wine-brewers.

Hence—2. Figuratively, to search out by perseverance and cunning; commonly followed by out: as, to ferret out a secret.

The Inquisition ferreted out and drove into banishment some considerable remnants of that unfortunate race [the Moorish].

H. Swinburne, Travels through Spain, xv.

If they ferret the mystery out of one hole they run it to cover in another.

The Century, XXVII, 926.

3. To search (a place). [Rare.]

Sound round the Cels of th' Ocean dradly-deep;
Measure the Mountains snowie tops and steep;
Ferret all Corners of this mether Ball.

Sylvestor, tr. of Du Bartas's Weeks, ii., The Magnificence.

4t. To worry, as a ferret does his prey.

I'll fer him, and firik him, and ferret him.

Shak., Hen. V., iv, 4.

5. To hunt with ferrets: as, to ferret rats with trained ferrets.

ferret² (fer-ēt), n. [< It. fioretto, a little flower, flower-work upon lace or embroidery, coarse ferret-silk, = F. fleur, floret, silk, dim. of It. fior = F. fleur, a flower; see floret, flower.] Originally, a silk tape or narrow ribbon used for fastening or lacing; now, a narrow worsted or cotton ribbon used for binding, for shoestrings, etc., and also, when dyed in bright colors, for cockades, rosettes, etc.

"We have a small account against you at the store, some pins and ferret, I believe," said Deacon Penrose; "hope you will call and settle before you leave."

ferreter (fer-ēt-ēr), n. 1. One who uses a ferret in catching or killing rats, rabbits, and other vermin.—2. One who pries into the private affairs of others for the purpose of unearthing secrets, or of bringing anything to light. Johnson.

ferreting (fer-ēt-ing), n. [Verbal n. of *ferret*¹, v.] The sport of hunting with ferrets.

ferretto (fer-ēt-ō), n. [It. ferretto (di Spagna, of Spain), dim. of ferra, < L. ferrum, iron: see ferric.] Copper encased with brimstone or white vitriol, used in coloring glass. — Spanish ferretto, a rich reddish brown, obtained by calcining copper and sulphur together in closed crucibles. Wade.

ferriage (fer-i-j), n. [Early mod. E. also feri-age, ferrage; < ME. ferage, ferage; < ferry + -age.] 1. Conveyance over a stream or other water by a ferry-boat or other similar means of transport: the act or business of ferrying.

"In feth," said Merlin, "ther is no pericle, but oth'r to aske a lusting of elles the feri-age."

Morte Arthur (E. E. T. S.), iii, 605.

2. Provision for ferrying; means of crossing a stream or other water by ferrying; as, inadequate ferriage; the ferriage of the river is neglected.—3. The price charged for ferrying; as, the ferriage has been reduced.

But first he placed the usefull obols,
The ferriage of the dead, beneath her tongue;
Her spirit she had wander'd by the Styx

An hundred years among the wretched ghosts.

R. H. Stoddard, The Fisher and Charon.

ferric (fer-ik), a. [= F. ferrique, < L. ferrum, iron: see ferric.] Pertaining to or extracted from iron; specifically, pertaining to iron in the quadrivalent condition. A ferric compound is one in which the iron enters as a hexavalent radical consisting of two quadrivalent atoms. These compounds are often called sesqui compounds, as, iron sesquioxide (Fe₂O₃) and iron sesquioxide (Fe₂O₃). Ferric acid, an acid of iron (H₂FeO₄) never obtained in the free state. A few salts of this acid are known and are called ferrates. Ferric salts, salts in which iron is considered as quadrivalent and two atoms of iron form a sesquivalent radical, as Fe₂O₃.

ferricalcite (fer-i-kal'sit), n. [< L. ferrum, iron, + calx (calx), lime, + *-ite*².] A species of calcareous earth or limestone combined with a large proportion (from 7 to 14 per cent.) of iron.

ferricyanic (fer-i-si-an'ik), a. [< L. ferrum, iron, + E. cyan (agen) + -ic. Cf. ferrocyanic.] Related to or containing ferricyanogen. — Ferricyanic acid, H₃FeC₆N₆, an acid obtained by decomposing ferricyanide of lead with sulphuric acid, forming brown crystals which have an astringent taste.

ferricyanide (fer-i-si'an'id or -nid), n. [< ferricyan + *-ide*¹. Cf. ferricyanide.] A compound of a base or basic radical with ferricyanogen.

ferricyanogen (fer-i-si-an'ō-jen), n. [< L. ferrum, iron, + E. cyanogen, q. v.] A hexad radical, (FeC₆N₆)₂.

ferrier¹ (fer-i-ēr), n. [Formerly also feriour; < ferry + *-er*¹.] A ferryman.

Also if any boteman or feriour be dwelling in the ward, that taketh more for botemange or ferriage then is ordained.

Calthrop's Reports, 1670.

ferrier², n. An obsolete spelling of farrier.

ferriery, n. An obsolete spelling of farriery.

Sp. Louth.

ferriferous (fer-rif-ē-rus), a. [< L. ferrum, iron, + ferre, = E. *bear*¹, + -ous.] Containing iron or ores of iron. — Ferriferous rocks, rocks containing iron ore.

ferrill (fer'il), n. An obsolete form of *ferrule*².

ferrillite (fer-i-lit), n. [< L. ferrum, iron, + Gr. lithos, stone.] Ragstone.

ferrite (fer-it), n. [< L. ferrum, iron, + *-ite*².]

A term proposed by Vogelsang to include indeterminate mineral substances of a reddish color, frequently observed in certain igneous rocks when they are examined in thin sections under the microscope. They probably consist in most cases of hydrous oxide of iron.

ferrivorous (fer-riv-ō-rus), a. [< L. ferrum, iron, + -vorare, devour.] Iron-eating. [Rare.]

The idiot at Ostend . . . died at last in consequence of his appetite for iron. . . . This poor creature was really ferrivorous.

Southey, The Doctor, cxviii.

ferr-. An element in some compounds, representing the Latin ferrum, iron: used in chemistry to denote derivation from iron.

ferrocyanic (fer-ō-si-an'ik), a. [< L. ferrum, iron, + E. cyan (agen) + -ic.] Related to or containing the tetrad radical FeC₆N₆. Also ferroprussic. — Ferrocyanic acid, H₄FeC₆N₆, an acid obtained by decomposing ferricyanides with sulphuric acid.

ferrocyanide (fer-ō-si'an'id or -nid), n. [< ferrocyan + *-ide*¹.] A compound of a base or basic radical with ferrocyanogen. Potassium ferrocyanide, or yellow prussiate of potash, is commercially the most important ferrocyanide, being the starting-point for the production of all the cyanogen compounds. It is prepared by fusing in iron pots potassium carbonate, various sorts of animal refuse, as bone, hair, blood, etc., and iron filings. The fused mass is digested with water, and the yellow prussiate of potash separated by crystallization. It is a powerful oxidizing agent, and is used in the arts.

ferrocyanogen (fer-ō-si-an'ō-jen), n. [< L. ferrum, iron, + E. cyanogen, q. v.] A tetravalent radical, Fe(CN)₆, consisting of six cyanogen radicals united with one atom of iron. Ferricyanides may be regarded as compounds of this radical with a base.

ferronit, adv. [ME., also ferrum, a var. (as if dat.) of ferren, ferren, far; in phr. a ferron, a ferron, prop. comp. a-ferron, var. of aferron, aferre, afor, afar: see aferr.] Far. — A ferronit, afar.

I my self have seen a Ferron in that See, as though it hadde ben a gret Me full of Trees and Busenyle, full of Thornes and Breres, gret plenty.

Manderlyle, Travels, p. 271.

ferromagnetic (fer-ō-mag-net'ik), a. [< L. ferrum, iron, + E. magnetic.] Paramagnetic; behaving like iron in a magnetic field. See diamagnetic.

Faraday gives reasons for believing that all bodies are either ferromagnetic or diamagnetic.

W. K. Clifford, Lectures, I, 241.

ferromanganese (fer-ō-mang-ē-nēz), n. [< L. ferrum, iron, + E. manganese.] A variety of white pig-iron containing a relatively large amount of carbon, from 3½ to 6 per cent., and over 25 per cent. of manganese. It is largely used in the manufacture of Bessemer steel.

ferronière (fer-ro-ni-ēr'), n. [E.; cf. ferronier, an ironmonger, etc., < fer, < L. ferrum, iron.] A chain of gold, usually set with jewels, worn on the head by women.

Her Lady Blessington's hair is dressed close to her head, and parted on her forehead by a ferronière of turquoises.

Quoted in First Year of a Silken Reign, p. 36.

ferroprussiate (fer-ō-prus'iat), n. [< ferroprussic + -ate.] A compound of ferroprussic or ferrocyanic acid with a base.

to be . . . of African origin, about 14 inches long, of a pale yellowish color, with red spots on its head and in confinement in Europe and America to kill rats, rabbits, and ferroprussic (fer-ô-prus'ik), a. [< L. ferrum, iron, + E. prussic.] Same as ferrocyanic.

ferrosoferric (fer-rô-so-fér'ik), a. [*< L. as if ferrosus (< ferrum, iron) + ferrum, iron, + -ic.] In chem., a term applied to those iron compounds in which three iron atoms form a nucleus or radical which is octivalent, as magnetic oxide of iron, Fe₃O₄.

ferrotellurite (fer-ô-tel'û-rî-t), n. [< L. ferrum, iron, + E. tellurite.] A little-known mineral from Colorado, occurring in delicate tufts of minute yellow crystals: it is supposed to be a tellurate of iron.

ferrotype (fer'ô-tîp), n. [< L. ferrum, iron, + Gr. τυπος, impression.] A kind of positive photograph, so called because the sensitive film is laid on a sheet of enameled iron or tin: a tintype. The plate is exposed in the camera and then developed in the ordinary way.

ferrotypist (fer'ô-tî-pér), n. One who makes ferrotypes; a photographer who makes a specialty of ferrotypes.

This is the camera, and the only one, for the ferrotypist.
Silver Sunbeam, p. 568.

ferrous (fer'ûs), a. [< L. ferrum, iron, + -ous.] Pertaining to or obtained from iron; specifically, pertaining to iron in the bivalent condition: contrasted with ferric (which see).

It is necessary to ascertain whether the quantity of acetic acid present is sufficient to keep the ferrous acetate in solution. Workshop Receipts, 2d ser., p. 327.

Ferrous compounds, those compounds in which the basic radical is a single bivalent atom of iron, as ferrous oxide, FeO. Also called iron protoxid.

The ferrous compounds whose radical is a single bivalent atom of iron. Cooke, Chem. Philos.

ferruginated (fe-rû'jî-nâ-ted), a. [See ferruginous.] Having the color or properties of iron-rust.

ferrugineous (fe-rû-jîn'ê-us), a. [= Sp. Pg. It. ferrugineo, < L. ferruginus: see ferruginous.] Same as ferruginous.

Hence they are cold, hot, sweet, stinking, purgative, diuretic or ferrugineous. Reg. Works of Creation, i.

ferruginous (fe-rû'jî-nûs), a. [= F. ferrugineux = Sp. Pg. It. ferruginoso, *< L. as if ferruginosus, equiv. to ferruginus, commonly ferruginus, of the color of iron-rust, dark-red, dusky, of an iron taste, < ferrugo (ferrugin-), iron-rust, the color of iron-rust: see ferrugo.] 1. Of the color of iron-rust; light reddish brown.—2. Of the nature of or containing iron.

By this means I found the German spa to retain a little acidity, even here at London; but more than one of our own ferruginous springs did not, even upon this trial, appear to have any. Boyle, Works, IV, 814.

ferrugo (fe-rû'gô), n. [L., iron-rust, the color of iron-rust, < ferrum, iron. Cf. arugo, albugo.] In bot., a disease of plants commonly called rust (which see). It is caused by fungi of the family Uredinaceæ, and especially of its largest genus, Puccinia. Imp. Diet. [Not used.]

ferrule†, n. See ferule.

ferrule¹, ferule² (fer'il or -öl), n. [Corrupt forms, simulating in the term, the word ferule, and in the first syllable the L. ferrum, iron; formerly ferrel, ferri, earlier verrel, verrel, verel, virole, virole (see virole); < OE. virole, an iron ring put about the end of a staff, etc., a ferrule, F. virale = Sp. hirola = Pg. virola, a ferrule, < ML. virola, a ring, a bracelet, equiv. to L. viriola, a little bracelet, dim. of viria, a bracelet, armet (> It. virola, a ferrule, iron ring-bolt), < viere, twist, bind around, > villa, a fillet, band, akin to E. with2, withy, q. v.] 1. A ring or cap of metal put on a column, post, or staff, as on the lower end of a cane or an umbrella, to strengthen it or prevent it from wearing or splitting.

The ferrel of his stick Trying the mortar's temper 'tween the clunks
Of some new shop a-building.
Browning, How it Strikes a Contemporary.

2. A ring sliding on the shaft of a spear and holding firmly to it the long tangs of the head; also, a ring or socket protecting the butt-end of a spear-shaft. The latter was also used as a weapon, or, when of a chisel form, as a tool. Compare celt2.—3. In steam-boilers, a bushing for expanding the end of a flue.—4. The frame of a slate.—5. Anything like a ferrule (in sense 1) in form or position.

A ferrule of new bone formation, which is attached, above and below the breach, to the sound bone.
Buck's Handbook of Med. Science, V, 123.

Split ferrule, a device for strengthening a fishing-rod at the weakest point, where the ferrule joins the wood

I passed, methought, the melancholy flood,
With that sad ferri-man, which poets write of,
Unto the kingdom of perpetual night.
Shak., Rich. III., i, 4

Their ceremonies performed, they laid the corps in a boat, to be waited over Acherusia lake on the South of the city, by one only whom they call Charon; which gave to Orpheus the invention of his infernal ferri-man.
Snodgrass, Travels, p. 165.

ferry-master (fer'i-mâs tēr), n. 1. A superintendent of a ferry; a person in charge of a ferry-station.—2. A collector of ferrage-money.

Hornell, Letters, I, vi, 37.

5. In bee-keeping, in a fertilized state; pregnant. See the extract.

Another word which has been changed somewhat in its meaning . . . is the word fertile. . . It is now used by writers on bee-keeping to signify pregnant.

Thom, Bee, Apiculture, Int., p. v.

fertilely (fer'til-lî), adv. Fruitfully; abundantly.

Who, being grown to man's age, as our own eyes may judge, could not but fertilely requite his Father's Fatherly education.
See P. Schœn, Arcadia, ii, 155.

fertileness (fer'til-nês), n. Same as fertility.

According to the fecunditas of the Italian wit.
See P. Schœn, Defence of Poesy.

fertilisable, fertilisation, etc. See fertilizable, etc.

fertilitate (fer'til-i-tât), v. t. [< fertility + -ate2.] To make fertile; fertilize; impregnate.

A cock will in one day fertilitate the whole racemate, or cluster of eggs, which have not excluded for many weeks after.
See P. Schœn, Vol. 2, Lat., 14, 15.

fertility (fer'til-i-tî), n. [F. fertilité = Pr. fertilitat = Sp. fertilitad = Pg. fertilidade = It. fertilità, < L. fertilis, fruitful, fertile, < ferre.] 1. The state of being fertile or fruitful; the quality of producing in abundance; fecundity; productiveness: as, the fertility of land, or more rarely, of a breed of animals, a race of men, or an individual.

The fertility of a soil as it may perhaps better be called the productiveness of a plot depends on the number of crops subs produced, and on the number of seeds which these contain.
Bacurin, Cross and Self Fertilisation, p. 114.

2. Prolific invention; abundance of resources; mental abundance: as, the fertility of genius or imagination.

4. Fescue-grass. See Festuca.

The father panting woke, and oft, as dawn Aroused the black republic on his chins,
Sweeping the trothfully from the fescue, brush'd Thro' the dim meadows. Traveller, Aylmer's Field.

fescuet (fes'kü), v. t. [< fescue, n.] To use a fescue in teaching pupils to read.

A Minister that cannot be trusted to pray in his own words without being chew'd to, and fescuet to a formal injunction of his rote lesson, should as little be trusted to preach. Milton, On Det. of Humb. Remonst.

fescue-grass (fes'kü-gräs), n. The species of Festuca, a genus of grasses. See Festuca.

feselt, n. Same as feselt.

fess² (fes), n. [< Turk. fes; see fe]. A cap of cloth or felt, often embroidered, made in Russia, near the Black Sea.

fesse, fess¹ (fes), n. [< OF. fesse, a fesse, f. fuisse and fesse, < L. fascia, a band; see fascia]. 1. A small fagot. [Prov. Eng., only in the form fess.]—2. In her., a bearing always considered as one of the ordinaries, bounded by two horizontal lines drawn across the field which regularly contain between them one third of the escutcheon. This width, however, seems excessive unless when the fesse is charged with other bearing; therefore when plain it is often made narrower.

Argent, a Fesse Gules.

I can't recollect the least morsel of a fess or chevron of the Boynets. Walpole, Letters, II, 476.

Fesse angled, the fesse modified by having its direction broken and one half or a large part lifted higher than the rest, while retaining its horizontal direction. See fesse retinged, acute-angled, etc.—Fesse archy, fesse bowed, a bearing like the fesse, but slightly arched upward.

Fesse arrondi, a fesse whose edges are broken by large, shallow, convex curves. The blazon should specify how many concave curves there are, and whether they are on both sides or not. Also called fesse gored.—Fesse bottony, a fesse having in the middle a rounded projection at top and also at bottom, so that it resembles a fesse combined with a central disk. Also called fesse pumetty and fesse unny.

Fesse checky, a fesse charged with checkers in not less than three rows and in two alternating tinctures.—Fesse demi, a bearing representing half a fesse. It must be mentioned in the blazon whether the dexter or sinister half is borne.—Fesse double-beveled, a fesse bent at each end, having usually one of the ends bent upward and the other bent downward.—Fesse embriated, a fesse having a narrow fimbriation which is continued all round, across the ends as well as along the top and bottom boundary, so that it resembles a fesse surmounted by a fesse couped.—Fesse retinged, the break between the upper and the under part of the broken fesse if formed by right angles.—In fesse, lying in the direction of the fesse—that is, horizontally across the middle of the field: said of any bearing so placed.—Per fesse, or party per fesse, divided in the direction of the fesse—that is, by a horizontal line, or by a broken or varied line in a general horizontal direction.

fesse-point (fes'point), n. In her., the central point of the escutcheon—that is, the middle of a horizontal line in fesse: same as cant. See cut under center.

fessewise (fes'wiz), adv. In her., same as per fesse or in fesse.

fest², n. A Middle English form of fast. Chaucer.

festal (fes'tal), a. [= OF. festal, < L. festum, a holiday, a feast; see fast]. Pertaining to or befitting a feast or festival; hence, joyous; gay; jubilant; as, a festal air or look.

Life figures itself to me as a festal or funeral procession. Hawthorne, Old Mause.

O for festal dainties spread,
Like my bowl of milk and bread.

At Sutri there is a very noble one [amphitheater] cut out of the tufa rock, which was no doubt used by that people for festal representations long before Rome attempted anything of the kind.

J. Ferguson, Hist. Arch., I, 326.

Festal use. See ferial use, under ferial.

festally (fes'tal-i), adv. In a festal manner; joyfully; merrily.

The chapel bell on the engine sounded most festally on that sunny Sunday. The Century, XXIV, 27.

feater, n. A Middle English form of feast. Chaucer.

feater¹ (fes'ter), n. [Early mod. E. also feaster; < ME. feater, feater, < OF. feater, a fester (also in variously corrupted forms, feste, fiske, fescue, fester, fette, fatre, flautre), earlier fiste = Sp. fistola = Pg. fistula = It. fistola, < L. fistula, a sort of ulcer, fistula; see fistula, of which *feater*¹ is simply another form derived through the OE. The same terminal change (L. -stula, > OF. F. -tre, > E. -ter) appears also in chapter, chapter, and (in the French forms) apostle, epistle. In previous dictionaries the etymology of feater has been erroneously given, the most common explanation being based upon the verb, which is assumed to be a variant of feater: a fester being regarded, in this view, as a 'nourished,' fed, and hence 'matured' boil or tumor.] 1. An ulcer; a rankling sore; a small purulent tumor; more particularly, a superficial suppuration resulting from irritation of the skin, the pus being developed in vesicles of irregular figure and extent. Quinn.

Nade I bene that I had bene baptyzed in water and salt, This terdly feater wold never me free.

W. P. F. (ed. Halliwell), p. 85.

festino (fes-ti'nō), n. The mnemonic name of a mood of the second figure of syllogism having the major premise negative and the minor particular. The following is an example: No infallible utterance is false; some declaration of the Grand Lama is false; hence, some declaration of the Grand Lama is not infallible. The vowels, e, i, o, indicate the quantity and quality of the three propositions, universal negative, particular affirmative, particular negative. The t shows that the mood is reduced to ferio, and the s that in the reduction the major premise is simply converted. See mood². Sometimes called ferison.

festival (fes'ti-väl), a. and n. [< ME. festival (also accom. festiful, as if with E. suffix -ful),

< OF. festival, festuel, F. festival = Pr. Sp. Pg. festival, < ML. festivus, festival, festive, < L. festivus, festive; see fester and fest.] 1. a. OF. pertaining to, or befitting a feast; attending or marking a joyous celebration; joyous; festal; as, a festival entertainment.

The Conowens, upon festival days—when their school-boys go to Church to serve God, than go to the tavern.

Mandaible, Travels, p. 157.

In danger and trouble, natural religion teaches us to pray; in a festival fortune, our pride and our needs enforce us equally. Jer. Taylor, Works, ed. 1839, I, 68.

This being a festival day, the streets were crowded with people from town and country in their holiday attire.

Lady Rensay, Voyage of Sindbad, I, 11.

II. n. A festival day; a feast; a time of feasting; an anniversary or appointed day of festive celebration.

So tedious is this day,
As is the night before some festival.

To an impatient child. Shak., R. and J., III, 2.

The glad circle round them yield their souls
To festive mirth and wit that knows no gall.

Thomson.

The ghastly nature of the subject [the Dance of Death], being brought into a very lively contrast with the festive tone of the verses, . . . frequently recalls some of the better parts of those flowing stories that now and then occur in the "Mirror for Magistrates."

Tichborne, Span. Lit., I, 1.

festively (fes'tiv-lī), adv. In a festive manner.

festivity (fes-tiv'i-ti), n. pl. festivities (-tiz). [= OF. festivite = Sp. festividad = Pg. festividade = It. festività, < L. festivitas = s. < festivus, festive; see festive.] 1. Feasting, or the condition of joy and gaiety becoming a feast; joyfulness; gaiety; social entertainment with merry-making.

To some persons there is no better instrument to cause the remembrance, and to endure the affection to the article, than the recommending it by festivity and joy of a holiday.

Jer. Taylor.

2. A festival; a festive event or celebration.

There happening a great and solemn festivity, such as the sheep shearings used to be, David condenses ends to beg of a rich man some small repast.

South, sermons.

fête (fât), v. t.; pret. and pp. fêted, ppr. fêting. [Cf. F. fêter, keep as a festival, feast, entertain. < fête, n.: see fête, and cf. feast, v.] To entertain with a feast; honor with a festive entertainment: as, he was fêted everywhere.

The murder thus out, Hermann's fêted and thanked. While his rascally rival gets tossed in a blanket.

Burman, Ingoldsby Legends, II, 385.

fête-day (fât'dā), n. A festival day; a birthday; specifically, a name-day, as of a person named after a saint, celebrated on the anniversary of the saint.

A Councillor of the Parliament sent her on her fête-day a bouquet.

J. T. Fields, Underbrush, p. 227.

fetial (fē'shial), a. and n. [Cf. L. fetialis, improp. feciales, pertaining to the fetiales, a Roman college of priests, who sanctioned treaties when concluded and demanded satisfaction from the enemy before a formal declaration of war; prob. < fari, pp. fatus, speak: see fate, fable, etc.] I. a. In Rom. hist., pertaining to the college of fetials, or to the declaration of war by heralds: as, fetial law.

The fetial law in Rome's earlier days must have been the common property of all the Latin cities, a living law under the protection of the higher powers, introduced to prevent or to initiate a state of war.

Woolsey, Introd. to Inter. Law, § 8.

II. n. One of the fetiales.

Also fecial.

fetiales (fē-shi-ā'lēz), n. pl. [L., pl. of fetialis: see fetial.] In Rom. antiq., a college of priests who served as guardians of the public faith. They conducted the formal religious ceremonies attendant upon demanding redress from a foreign people in case of offense and upon the declaration of war and the ratification of peace. Their president was styled the pater patratus.

But its [the caduceus's] foreign origin is shown by the fact that, although it was a sign of peace, it was never borne by the fetiales, the old Italian heralds.

feticid, feticism, etc. See fist, etc.

feticidal (fē'ti-si-dal), a. [Cf. feticid + -al.] Of, pertaining to, or used in feticide. Also faticidal.

He still insists that needles are used in the feticidal art.

R. P. Harris, Med. News, XLIX, 221.

feticide (fē'ti-sid), n. [Cf. L. fetus, a fetus, + -idium, a killing, < cadere, kill.] In med. jurisprudence, the destruction of the life of a fetus. Also faticide.

feticism (fē'ti-siz-m), n. An improper and little-used form of fetichism.

fetid (fē'tid or fē'tid), a. [Cf. L. fetidas, less correctly fetidus, fetidus, stinking, fetid, < ferere, less correctly fatere, fatere, stink, allied to fumus, smoke: see fume.] Having an offensive smell; stinking.

Most putrefactions . . . smell either fetid or mouldy.

fetish (fē'tish), n. [Also, after the French, fétich; first in E. in the form fetisso (< Pg. fetigo): later after the F. (the word having come into general European use in consequence of the work of Charles de Brosses, "Du Culte des Dieux fétiches," 1760); = D. fétiche = Sw. Dan. fetisch = G. fetisch, < F. fétiche, < Pg. fetigo, artificial (cf. fetigo, n., sorcery, charm, allurements, feticura, sorcery, witchcraft, feticuro, sorcerer, wizard, etc.) = Sp. hechizo, artificial, imitated (cf. hechizo, bewitchment, fascination, hechiceria, sorcery, witchcraft, hechicero, sorcerer, etc.) = It. fettizio, artificial = OF. faitise, faite (> ME. fetise), F. restored faite, artificial, < L. facticus, less correctly facticus, made by art, artificial, factitious, < facere, make: see fact, and cf. facticus, fetise, *feat*², feutons, which are thus doublets of fetish. The word seems to have been applied by the Portuguese sailors and traders on the west coast of Africa to objects worshiped by the natives, which were regarded as charms or talismans.] I. Any material object regarded with awe, as having mysterious powers residing in it or as being the representative or habitation of a deity to which worship may be paid, and from which supernatural aid is to be expected. A fetish may be an animal, as a cock, a serpent, a bear, etc., or an inanimate object, as a tree, a river, a stone, a tooth, a shell, a shaving, etc. The worship of fetishes belongs to a low and brutish stage or form of religion.

When the klug (in Guinea) will sacrifice to Fetisso, he commands the Petrasco (Pg. feticero, sorcerer) to enquire of a Tree, whereto he ascribeth Divinitie, what hee will demand.

Purchas, Pilgrimage, p. 651.

To class an object as a fetish demands explicit statement that a spirit is considered as embodied in it or acting through it or communicating by it or at least that the people it belongs to do habitually think thus of such objects; or it must be shown that the object is treated as having personal consciousness and power, is talked with, worshipped, prayed to, sacrificed to, petted or ill treated with reference to its past or future behaviour to its votaries.

E. B. Tylor, Prim. Culture, II, 133.

Before experience had yet taught men to distinguish between the possible and the impossible, and while they were ready on the slightest suggestion to ascribe unknown powers to any object and make a fetish of it, their conceptions of humanity and its capacities were necessarily vague and without specific limits.

H. Spencer, Universal Progress, p. 66.

Hence—2. An object of blind devotion: an idol: as, gold has become his fetish.

No faith in the cross that makes a fetish of the cross is going to stand proof.

fetichism (fē'tish-izm), n. [Also, after the French, fétichisme, and sometimes fetichism = F. fétichisme; as fetish + -ism.] 1. The practice of worshipping a fetish; that form of religious belief and practice in which fetishes are the objects of worship. See the extracts.

The President de Brosses, a most original thinker of the last century, struck by the descriptions of the African worship of material and terrestrial objects, introduced the word Fétichisme as a general descriptive term; and since then it has obtained great currency by Comte's use of it to denote a general theory of primitive religion, in which external objects are regarded as animated by a life analogous to man's. . . . It seems to me . . . more convenient to use the word Animism for the doctrine of spirits in general, and to confine the word Fetichism to that subordinate department which it properly belongs to; namely, the doctrine of spirits embodied in, or attached to, or conveying influence through, certain material objects. Fetichism will be taken as including the worship of "stocks and stones," and thence it passes by an imperceptible gradation into idolatry. E. B. Tylor, Prim. Culture, II, 132.

Fetichism is almost the opposite of Religion; it stands towards it in the same relation as Alchemy to Chemistry, or Astrology to Astronomy, and shows how fundamentally our idea of a deity differs from that which presents itself to the savage. The Negro does not hesitate to punish a refractory Fetish, and hides it in his waste kufiri he does not wish to know what is going on. Aladdin's lamp is, in fact, a well known illustration of a fetish.

Sir J. Lubbock, Orig. of Civilisation, p. 149.

A latent fetichism, which is betrayed in that love of personification, or of applying epithets derived from efficient beings to inanimate nature, . . . is the root of a great part of our opinions.

Locke, Europ. Morals, I, 172.

Hence—2. Blind devotion to one object or idol as object of superstition.

fetichist (fē'tish-ist), n. and a. [Also fetichist; < fetish + -ist.] I. n. A worshiper of fetishes.

The Vegils, though baptized, are in fact fetichists, as much as the unconverted Samoyeds.

Engce. Brit., XXI, 81.

Enmity; animosity; active hostility; a vengeful quarrel between individuals or parties; especially, hostility between families or parties in a state; a state of civic contention.

The natural issue of this [unreasonable desire] must be perpetual feuds and bickerings, contentions and struggles. Bp. Atterbury, Sermons, II. xvii.

The personal feuds and animosities that happen among so small a people might obstruct the course of justice. J. Adams, Works, IV. 306.

It was said that Francis and Hastings were notoriously on bad terms, that they had been at feud during many years, that on one occasion their mutual aversion had impelled them to seek each other's lives.

Macaulay, Warren Hastings.

The origin of the d in ML. feudum is uncertain; as the word was artificial, the d was perhaps a mere insertion to avoid the collocation can; the reg. ML. reflex of the OHG., etc., would be feum, which actually occurs in the Doomsday Book. *Feud*² and its derivatives are less prop. spelled feod, etc.] 1. In feudal law, an estate in land granted on condition of services to be rendered to the grantor, in default of which the land was to revert to the grantor; a fief; a tenure of land under and by dependence on a superior. The grantor or lord was entitled to the homage or fealty of the grantee or vassal. The estate was so called in contradistinction to allodium, which is an estate subject to no superior but the general law of the land.

Palgrave considers that the origin of feudal tenure may be traced to the grants made by the Romans to the barbarian laeti occupying the limitanean or Riparian territories, upon the condition of performing military service. These donations or feuds descended only to the male heir of the tenant, and could not be alienated to a non-military tenant.

W. K. Sullivan, Intro. to O'Curry's Anc. Irish, p. cxxviii.

2. Land held in feudal tenure by a vassal.

The essential and fundamental principle of a territorial feud was, that it was land held by a limited or conditional estate—the property being in the lord, the usufruct in the tenant.

W. K. Sullivan, Intro. to O'Curry's Anc. Irish, p. cxxvii.

Scott, L. of L. M., II. 1.

feudal² (fū'dal), a. [Also written feudal; = F. feudal = Sp. Pg. feudal = It. feudale = G. feudal, etc., < ML. feudalis, feudal, a vassal. < feudum, a feud; see *feud*².] 1. Pertaining to feuds, fiefs, or fees; relating to or dependent upon the method of landholding called feud, fief, or fee; as, feudal tenure; feudal rights or services; a feudal lord or vassal.

The feudal tenure, which was certainly at first the tenure of servants who, but for the dignity of their master, might have been called slaves, became in the Middle Ages the tenure of noblemen.

Maine, Early Law and Custom, p. 241.

The old feudal spirit which prompted a man to treat his tenants and vassals as part of his stock . . . had been crushed before the reign of Edward III.

Stubbs, Const. Hist., § 469.

2. Pertaining to the state of society under this system of tenure; characteristic of the relations of lord and vassal.

It is time . . . that we had a feudal map of England before the manorial boundaries are wiped away.

Stubbs, Medieval and Modern Hist., p. 61.

Feudal system, a system of political organization with reference to the tenure of land and to military service and allegiance prevalent in Europe in the middle ages. Its main peculiarity was that the bulk of the land was divided into fiefs or fiefs, held by their owners on condition of the performance of certain duties, especially military services, to a superior lord, who, on default of such performance, could reclaim the land. This superior might be either the sovereign, or some subject who thus held of the sovereign, and in turn had created the fief by subfeudation. According to the pure feudal system, the lord was entitled to the fealty of his tenants, but not to that of their subtenants, every man looking only to his immediate lord. On the continent of Europe, while the system was in full operation, this principle made the great lords practically independent of their nominal sovereigns, who could command their allegiance only through their self-interest or by superior force; and therefore kings were often powerless against their vassals. In England, however, the sovereign was always entitled to the fealty of all his subjects. Feudal tenures were abolished in England by act of Parliament in 1606, in Scotland in 1747, and in France at the revolution of 1789. In Germany, Austria, etc., they continued till after the revolutionary movements of 1848-50. In each case, however, they had long previously been much mitigated in their social and political effects. A feudal system prevailed in China from a very early period, but was brought to an end in 220 B.C., on the conquest of the whole country by Siang Wang of Tsin, known as Tsin-shi-hwang-ti. The feudal system of Japan was abolished in 1871, when the daimios or barons surrendered their lands to the mikado. See daimio.

feudalism (fū'dal-izm), n. [= F. feudalisme = Sp. Pg. It. feudalismo; as *feudat*² + -ism.] The feudal system and its incidents; the system of holding lands by military service.

On the seemingly trifling pomp and pretence of chivalry, the mischievous fabric of extinct feudalism was threatening gradually to reconstruct itself. Stubbs, Const. Hist., § 469.

Feudalism was really a co-operative association for the mutual defence of the members.

Also written feudary.

feudatary (fū'dā-tā-ri), a. and n. [= F. feudataire = Sp. Pg. It. feudatario, a. and n., < ML. feudatarius, n., the holder of a feud, prop. adj., < feudum, a feud; see *feud*². Cf. feudatory and feudary.] Same as feudary.

feudatory (fū'dā-tō-ri), a. and n. [The more exact form (for the n.) is feudatory, < ML. feudatarius, n.; see feudary. Cf. ML. feudator, the holder of a feud, < feudum, a feud; see *feud*².] 1. a. Holding or held from another on feudal tenure. See *feudat*².

He hath claimed the kingdom of England, as feudatory to the see apostolic. Jer. Taylor, Works, ed. 1830, II. 194.

II. n.; pl. feudatories (-rīz). 1. A tenant or vassal holding his lands of a superior on condition of military or feudal service; the tenant of a feud or fief. See *feudat*².

The Norman Conquest . . . introduced the feudal system, with its necessary appendages, a hereditary monarchy and nobility; the former in the line of the chief, who led the invading army, and the latter in that of his distinguished followers. They became his feudatories. The country—both land and people (the latter as serfs)—was divided between them.

Calhoun, Works, I. 769.

The great feudatory at Rome seemed, in a way in which no other feudatory seemed, to shut up his overlord in a kind of prison.

E. J. Freeman, Norman Conquest, II. 132.

2. A fief.

A service paid by the King of Spain for the kingdoms of Naples and Sicily, pretended feudatories to the Pope.

Erskine, Inquiry, Nov. 22, 1644.

It must not be supposed that in the partition of France into feudatories the king was ignored. He took the very nature of the system, was its head, from whom all authority theoretically descended.

Stoll, Stud. Med. Hist., p. 142.

feudbote (fū'dōt), n. [A mod. form, repr. AS. fahth-bōt, < faihth, a feud, quarrel, & bōt, amends, fine, boot; see fiend and boot.] A fine for engaging in a feud or quarrel.

feu de joie (fē dē zhō), [F., a bonfire, lit. fire of joy; fū, fire, < L. focus, a hearth, fireplace (see focus); dē, of; joy, see joy. Hence E. dial. (Craven) feudjor, a bonfire.] A bonfire, or a firing of guns, in token of joy.

About three o'clock the discharge of fifty pieces of cannon was answered by a feu de joie from all the regiments of the garrison, and the yeomanry corps drawn up for the purpose in Stephen's Green.

Macaulay, 7th ser., III. 499.

feudist (fū'dist), n. [< F. feudiste = Sp. Pg. feudista, < ML. feudum, feud; see *feud*².] 1. A writer on feuds; one versed in feudal law.

I read it, as the feudist does, as an unpractical doctrine, a right to use another man's land, not a property in it.

Spelman, Feuds and Tenures, II.

2. One living under the feudal system.

The Greeks, the Romans, the Britons, the Saxons, and even originally the feudists, divided the lands equally.

Blackstone, Comment, II. xiv.

feudum (fū'dum), n. [ML., also feodum, feudum; see *feud*².] 1. Land granted to be held as a benefice, in distinction from land granted to be held allodially.—2. An estate of inheritance; an interest in land descendible to heirs.

K. E. Digby.

fiancé, fiancée (fē-oh-sā'), n. [F., m. and f. pp. of fiancer, betroth: see fiancé, v.] An affianced or betrothed person, male (fiancé) or female (fiancée).

fianti, fianti, n. [Perversions of fiat, prob. intended to reflect the fiat, the plur. corresponding to fiat, sing.: see fiat.] Commission; fiat.

Nought suffered he the Ape to give or graunt,
But through his hand must pass the Fiannt.
Spenser, Mother Hub. Tale, I, 1114

fianti (fī'anti), n. [OF. fians, fians, fiant, fiant, fien, fien, fime, dung, F. dial. fian = Pr. fem = Cat. fems = Sp. fimo = It. fimo, fime, < L. fimus, dung, dirt. A parallel form appears in OF. fient, F. fiente = Pr. fenta, mod. Pr. fento, finto = Cat. femta, < L. as if finita*, perhaps an alteration of L. fimctum, a dung-hill: see fime.] In hunting, the dung of the boar, wolf, fox, marten, or badger.

fiar (fō'ār), n. [Sc., prob. another form of fiar, < fien, a fee or feud: see fien, fer, feud.] 1. In Scots law, one to whom any property belongs in fee—that is, one who has the property in reversion as contrasted with life-rent; the person in whom the property of an estate is vested, burdened with the right of life-rent.—2. pl. In Scotland, the prices of the different kinds of grain for the current year, as fixed by the sheriff of each county and a jury, after the production of expert evidence, and the hearing of all parties interested. This proceeding, which takes place in February or March, is called striking the prices; the prices thus struck are called fiar prices, and rule in all grain contracts where no price had been specified, as well as in calculating the money value of such stipends, rents, etc., as are properly payable in grain.

fiaschetta (fīās-kel'tā), n.: pl. fiaschette (-te). [It., dim. of fiasco, a flask: see flask.] 1. A small thin glass bottle generally invested in a complete covering of wicker or plaited straw or maize-leaves as a protection.—2. A small earthenware vessel, generally fantastic in shape and decoration. [Rare.]

fiaschino (fīās-kē'nō), n.: pl. fiaschini (-nō). [It., dim. of fiasco, a flask.] An earthenware vessel of fantastic form.

The old Italian fiaschini in the shape of fruit.
Jour. Archaeol. Ass., XII, 100.

fiasco (fīās'kō), n. [It. fiasco, a flask or bottle: fur fiasco, make a fiasco, fail. "In Italy, when a singer fails to please, the audience shout 'Ola, ola, fiasco,' perhaps in allusion to the bursting of a bottle."] 1. A flask; a bottle. See flask.

He [Mr. T. A. Trollope] lived in Florence in the days of the Grand Duke . . . when a fiasco of good Chianti could be had for a pail.
Atheneum, Nov. 12, 1887, p. 653.

2. A failure in a musical or dramatic performance; an ignominious failure of any kind; a complete breakdown.

Owing to the disunion of the Fenians themselves, the vigor of the administration, and the treachery of informers, the rebellion was a fiasco.

W. S. Greig, Irish Hist. for Eng. Readers, p. 160.

fiat (fī'at), n. and a. [L. fiat, let it be done, 3d pers. sing. subj. pres. of faci, be done, become, come into existence, used as pass. of facere, make, do: see fact.] In the first sense there is often an allusion to Gen. i. 3 (Vulgate): "Dixitque Deus: Fiat lux. Et facta est lux." ("And God said, Let there be light. And there was light.") 1. n. 1. A command that something be done; specifically, an absolute and efficient command proceeding from, or as if from, divine or creative power.

So that we, except God say Another fiat, shall have no more day.
Donne, The Storm.

Why did the fiat of a God give birth
To you fair Sun, and his attendant Earth?
Cooper, Two Months, I, 35.

The fiat "Let light be" was the commencement of developments, before the earth or other spheres had existence.

Bibliotheca Sacra, XLIII, 388.

2. In Eng. law, a short order or warrant of some judge for making out and allowing certain processes, given by his subscribing the words fiat ut petitur, 'let it be done as is asked.'

Fiat in bankruptcy, the lord chancellor's allowance of a commission in bankruptcy.

II. a. Existing as if by absolute divine or creative command; having the character or power of such a command. [Colloq.]

The verdict of approval, however, has usually taken a form which implies a certain fiat power in the Convention.
New Princeton Rev., IV, 176.

Fiat money. See money.

fiancé, n. See fiancé.

fianti, n. See fianti.

fib (fīb), n. [Of dial. origin; prob. an abbr. form of fibble* or fible, a weakened form of fabble, appearing in E. dial. fible-fable, nonsense: see fable, n.] A lie; specifically, a white lie; a venial falsehood, told to save one's self or another from embarrassment.

Ask me no questions, and I'll tell you no *fib*s.
Goldsmith, The Stoops to Conquer, iii.

Destroy his fib or sophistry . . . in vain;
The creature's at his duty work again.
Pope, Tril. to Satires, I, 91.

She was for the fib, but not the lie; at a word, she could be disdainful of subterfuges.
G. Meredith, The Egoist, xxiv.

fib (fīb), v.: pret. and pp. fibbed, ppr. fibbing. [fīb*, n.] I. intrans. To say what is not true; lie, especially in a mild or comparatively innocent way.

Cynthia, I don't blush, Sir, for I vow I don't understand.
See Phant, I shaw, I shaw, you fib, you Baggage, you do understand, and you shall understand.
Comstock, Double-Dealer, iv, 3.

If you have any mark whereby one may know when you fib and when you speak truth, you had best tell it me.
Arbuthnot.

II. trans. To tell a fib to; lie to. [Rare.]
To fib a man.
De Quincey.

fib (fīb), v.: pret. and pp. fibbed, ppr. fibbing. [Origin obscure.] I. trans. To beat or strike, especially by delivering a succession of short rapid blows. [Slang.]

I have been taking part in the controversy about "Bell and the Dragon," as you will see in the Quarterly, where I have fibbed the Edinburgh (as the bany say) most completely.
Santner, Letters (1811), II, 256.

II. intrans. To deliver a succession of short rapid blows. [Slang.]

fibber (fīb'ēr), n. One who tells fibs or lies.
Your royal grandsire (trust me, I'm no fibber)
Was vastly fond of Colley Cibber.
Walcut (P. Pindar), p. 137.

fibbery (fīb'ēr-i), n. [fīb* + -ery.] The act or practice of fibbing. [Rare.]

"Time has not thinned my flowing locks." Now do not suspect me of fibbery, or rub your memory till it smarts again. The thing is sure enough, and the "perch" is — they never flowed at all.
Lambert, The Century, XXXV, 520.

fiber (fīb'ēr), n. [= G. Dan. Sw. fibr, < F. fibre = Pr. fibra = Sp. fibra, fibra = Pg. l. fibra, < L. fibra, a fiber, filament (of plant or animal), akin to fimbria, fibers, threads, fringe (> ult. E. fringe), and perhaps to fibon, a thread. > ult. E. fib < fib < fib.] 1. A thread or filament; any fine thread-like part of a substance, as a single natural filament of wool, cotton, silk, or asbestos, one of the slender terminal roots of a plant, a drawn-out thread of glass, etc.

Inevitable habits choke the infant's heart,
Their fibers penetrate its tenderest part.
Cooper, Retribution, I, 42.

Old Yew which grasped at the stones
That name the under-lying dead,
Thy fibers met the dreadless head,
Thy roots are wrapt about the bones.
Tempsen, in Memoriam, ii.

2. In a collective sense, a filamentous substance; a conglomeration of thread-like tissue, such as exists in animals and plants generally; more generally, any animal, vegetable, or even mineral substance the constituent parts of which may be separated into or used to form threads for textile fabrics or the like; as, muscular or vegetable fiber; the fiber of wool; silk, cotton, or jute fiber; asbestos, fiber.—3. Figuratively, sinew; strength; as, a man of fiber.
Yet had no fibers in him, nor no force.
Chapman.

4. Material; stuff; quality; character.

Our friend Mr. Lulliver had a good natured fiber in him.
Gulliver's Travels, II, 10.

The stuff of which poets are made, whether finer or not, is of very different fiber from that which is used in the tough fabric of martyrs. Lamb, Study Windows, p. 266.

But how are ordinary men, of no specially elevated moral fiber, to be carried up to the turning point where Law is superseded by Love?
E. P. Cobbe, Peak in Darin, p. 62.

Specifically—5. In anat. and zool.: (a) A filament; a slender thread-like element, as of muscular or nervous tissue. Most tissues and structures of the body are composed of bundles of fibers. See cut under muscular. (b) Fibrous tissue in general. Arciform fibers, arcuate fibers, collateral fibers, elastic fibers, etc. See the adjectives. Fibers of Corti, minute rod-like bodies specialized from the epithelial lining of the canals cochlear resting upon the basilar membrane which separates the canals cochlear from the scala tympani, and forming an essential part of the organ of hearing. Also called Corti fibers. Glandular woody fiber. See almond fiber. Kittul fiber. See Caryota.—Non-striated fiber, in anat., a muscular fiber without transverse striations, in distinction from striated fibers, which compose the voluntary muscles and the heart. Sharpey's fibers, or propagating rods of Sharpey, very fine processes passing through and seeming to rivet together several concentric laminae of bone-tissue; perforating fibers. Smooth fiber, the non-striated fiber of muscles. Striated fiber, myofibril, a muscular fiber. See muscularized fiber. Vegetable fibers, the narrow elongated cells which characterize the woody and leaf tissues of plants, giving them strength, toughness, and elasticity. Bast or linc fibers, which are found chiefly in the bark, are distinguished from wood fibers by being usually longer, thicker walled and tougher. The cells are spindle shaped with pointed ends, and cohere firmly to each other by the extremities, forming most of the textile fibers in common use. The length of the individual cells varies greatly, from less than a millimeter in many plants to an inch or two in hemp or flax, and from 2 to 6 or 5 inches or more in laminae of China grass fiber. (See cut under bast.) The so-called fibers of cotton and similar material which are found in seed coats are really hairs, and not proper fibers. Vulcanized fiber, paper, paper pulp, or other preparation of vegetable fiber saturated and coated with a metallic chloride, as tin, cadmium, magnesium, or aluminum chloride, with the effect of giving to the material toughness and strength. E. H. Knight.

fiber (fīb'ēr), n. [NL., < L. fibra, a heaver, = E. haecet, q. v.] 1. The specific name of the beaver, Castor fiber.—2. [cap.] A genus of rodents, of the family Muridae and subfamily Arvicolinae, of which the type is the muskrat, musquash, or ondatra of North America, Fiber zibethicus, having a long scaly tail, vertically flattened, and large webbed hind feet. See muskrat.

fibered, fibred (fīb'ēr-d), a. [fiber* + -ed.] Furnished with fibers; having fibers; fibrous.

Monstrous ivy-stems
Clasped the gray walls with hairy-fibred arms.
Tennyson, to Land.

fiber-gun (fīb'ēr-gun), n. A device for disintegrating vegetable fiber. It consists of a cylinder into which flax, hemp, or similar fibers are put, and which is then charged with steam, gas, or air under great pressure. The cover of the cylinder is suddenly taken off and the mass is thrown into a chamber, where the fiber is disintegrated by the sudden expansion of the fluid. E. H. Knight.

fiberless, fibreless (fīb'ēr-less), a. [fiber* + -less.] Without fiber, in any sense of that word.

What he [one of the "Limp People"] wants is a place where he is not obliged to depend on himself, where he has to do a fixed amount of work for a fixed amount of salary, and where his fiberless plasticity may find a mould ready formed, into which it may run without the necessity of forging shapes for itself.
W. Matthews, Getting on in the World, p. 61.

fibrose (fīb'ēr-ōs), n. [fiber* + -ose.] A name given at one time by Frémy to a certain supposed modification of cellulose.

fiber-stitch (fīb'ēr-stich), n. A stitch used in pillow-lace.

fibra (fīb'ēr-ā), n.: pl. fibrae (-ārē). [L.: see fiber.] In anat., a fiber, in general; used in a few Latin anatomical phrases: as, fibra arciformis, the arciform fibers (which see, under arciform); fibra primitiva, the primitive fiber or axis-cylinder of a nerve.

fibration (fīb'ēr-ā-shon), n. [fiber*, fiber, + -ation.] The formation of fibers, or fibrous construction of a part or organ; fibrillation: as, the fibration of the white tissue of the brain; the fibration of minerals.

fibre, fibred, etc. See fiber, etc.

fibriform (fīb'ēr-i-fōrm), a. [fiber*, fiber, + -form, form.] Fibrous in form or structure; composed of fibers; like a fiber or set of fibers.

fibril (fīb'ēr-il), n. [= F. fibrille = Pg. fibrilla = It. fibrilla, < NL. fibrilla, q. v.] 1. A small fiber; a fibrilla; a filament. Specifically—2. In bot.: (a) One of the delicate cottony hairs or thread-like growths found upon the young rootlets of some plants. (b) A rootlet of a lichen. (c) One of the filaments which line the utricle of Sphagnum. (d) The stipe of some fungi; in this sense disused. Muscular fibril, in anat., one of the fine longitudinal threads into which a muscle fiber is separable. See cut under muscle. Nerve-fibrils, in anat., those fibrils which constitute the axis cylinder of a nerve.

fibrilla (fīb'ēr-il-ā), n.: pl. fibrillae (-ārē). [NL., dim. of L. fibra, a fiber; see fiber.] A little fiber; a fibril; a filament. Specifically—(a) A delicate thread-like structure developed in the cortical layer of many mushrooms, as also in the footstalk of Pezizella, having a rudimentary muscular function. (b) In bot., same as fibra.

fibrillar (fīb'ēr-il-ār), a. [fibrilla* + -ar.] Of, pertaining to, or of the nature of fibrilla or fibrils; filamentous. Also phrillous.

Dr. Klein reports that the two specimens of fibro-cartilage which had been subjected to artificial digestion were "in that state of digestion in which we find connective tissue when treated with an acid. . . . the fibrillar bundles having become homogeneous, and lost their fibrillar structure. Darwin, Insectiv. Plants, p. 105.

fibrillary (fī'brī-lā-rī), a. [< fibrilla + -ary.] Fibrillar.

Upon examination by Drs. Brower and Lyman he had pupillary inequality, nystagmus, ocillatus twitchings of muscles of face. Aron, and Neurol., IX, 463.

fibrillate (fī'brī-lāt, v. t.; pret. and pp. fibrillated, pp. fibrillating, n. [< fibrilla + -ate.]) To form into fibrils or fibers.

fibrillate (fī'brī-lāt, a. Same as fibrillated.

In 1920, a specimen of Sporophytes the surface of sections or broken pieces may often appear fibrillate, even to the naked eye. De Long, Funzi (trans.), p. 57.

fibrillated fī'brī-lā-ted, a. Having fibrils; consisting of fibrillae; finely fibrous in structure.

The tectate sheaf may be regarded as a fibrillated spindle. Encyc. Brit., XXII, 418.

fibrillation fī'brī-lā-shən, n. [< fibrillate + -ion.] The state of being fibrillar or fibrillated.

In the specimens of fibrocartilage which had been left in the leaves of Dioscorea, until they re-expanded, parts were altered, . . . they had become more transparent, almost hyaline, with the fibrillation of the bundles indistinct. Darwin, Insectiv. Plants, p. 105.

Muscular fibrillation, a localized quivering or flickering of muscular fibers. Quinn, Med. Dict.

fibrilliferous (fī'brī-lī'f-e-rus), a. [< NL. fibrilla, fibril, + L. ferre = E. bear.] Fibril-bearing; provided with fibrils.

fibrilliform (fī'brī-lī'f-orm), a. [< NL. fibrilla, fibril, + L. forma, form.] Resembling fibrillae or small fibers. Fibrilliform tissue, a phrase sometimes applied to the entangled fiber-like mycelium of many fungi and lichens; same as fibrous mycelium.

In some of the lower orders of plants there is a kind of tissue present to which . . . the names of tela contexta and interlacing fibrilliform tissue have been given. R. Bentley, Botany, p. 37.

fibrillose (fī'brī-lōs), a. [< fibrilla + -ose.] 1. In bot.: (a) Furnished or clothed with fibrils. (b) Composed of small fibers. — 2. Marked with fine lines, as if composed of fine fibrils; finely striate. Fibrillose mycelium. See mycelium.

fibrillous (fī'brī-lus), a. Same as fibrillar.

Hence arise those uneasy sensations, pains, fibrillous spasms, &c., that hypochondriacs usually complain of. Kilmer, The Nerves, p. 14.

fibrin (fī'brīn), n. [= F. fibrine = Sp. Fg. It. fibrina; < L. fibra, a fiber, + -in.] A complex nitrogenous substance belonging to the class of proteids. Its chemical composition is not certainly known. Fibrin is procured in its most characteristic state from fresh blood by whipping it with a bundle of twigs. It is also found in the chyle. It is an elastic solid body, generally having a filamentous structure, which softens in an becoming viscid brown, and semi-transparent, but is insoluble in water. It dissolves in solutions of many neutral salts, but is precipitated from them by heat or by acids; it is also soluble in alkali hydrates, and is not precipitated from such solutions by heat. A proteid somewhat resembling animal fibrin in its properties is extracted from wheat, corn, and other grains, and called vegetable fibrin. Fibrin ferment, a substance which may be obtained by mixing blood with alcohol, allowing it to stand, collecting the coagulated matter, and drying and extracting with water. It causes rapid coagulation of the blood.

fibrination (fī'brī-nā'shən), n. [< fibrin + -ation.] The acquisition of the capacity of forming in coagulation an amount of fibrin greater than is normal; as, the fibrination of the blood in pleurisy.

fibrine (fī'brīn), a. [< L. fibra, fiber, + -ine.] Presenting a fibrous appearance; finely divided or fringed. [Rare.]

A mixt of the subtle and gold in the west the phoenix coast of the free and Mount Edzembie trembled. W. C. R. H. A Strange Voyage, III.

fibrinogen fī'brī-nō-jen, n. [< fibrin + -gen; see -gen.] A proteid substance belonging to the group of globulins, found in the blood and concerned in the process of coagulation.

It should be recalled that generated in the blood and other parts of the chemical coagulation of two closely related compounds, which have been named by the author fibrinogen and fibrinoplastin. Lea and Hol and H. to Chem (trans.), p. 16.

fibrinogenic fī'brī-nō-jen'ik, a. [< fibrinogen + -ic.] Pertaining to or of the nature of fibrinogen; as, fibrinogenic substance.

fibrinogenous fī'brī-nō-jen'us, a. [< fibrinogen + -ous.] Having the character of fibrinogen; forming fibrin; as, a fibrinogenous substance.

fibrinoplastic (fī'brī-nō-plas'tik), a. [< fibrin + -plastic.] Having the character of fibrinoplastic.

It should be recalled that generated in the blood and other parts of the chemical coagulation of two closely related compounds, which have been named by the author fibrinogen and fibrinoplastin. Lea and Hol and H. to Chem (trans.), p. 16.

fibrinoplastin fī'brī-nō-plas'tin, n. [< fibrin + -plastic.] A proteid substance found in the blood, belonging to the group of globulins, and concerned in the process of coagulation; same as paraglobulin.

fibrous (fī'brī-mus), a. [< fibrin + -ous.] Having the character of fibrin; resembling fibrin.

fibro-areolar (fī'brō-a-rē'ō-lār), a. Consisting of tissue made up of fibrous and areolar varieties of connective tissue.—Fibro-areolar fascia. See fascia.

fibroblast (fī'brō-blāst), n. [< L. fibra, fiber, + Gr. βλαστος, germ.] One of the cells which give rise to connective tissue.

fibroblastic (fī'brō-blas'tik), a. [< fibroblast + -ic.] Giving rise to fibrous or connective tissue, as a cell; of the nature of or pertaining to fibroblasts.

fibrocalcereous (fī'brō-kal-kā'rē-us), a. [< L. fibra, fiber, + calcarius, of lime; see calcareous.] Consisting of fibrous tissue and containing calcareous bodies, as the skin of a holothurian.

fibrocartilage (fī'brō-kār'tī-lāj), n. [< L. fibra, fiber, + cartilago, cartilage.] 1. A tissue resembling cartilage, but differing from it in that the intercellular substance becomes fibrillated. In the immediate vicinity of the cells, however, the intercellular substance is as in ordinary cartilage, and forms the hyaline capsules of the cells.

2. A part of fibrocartilaginous tissue; any individual plate, disk, or other piece of fibrocartilage lying in or about a joint.—Acromioclavicular fibrocartilage, a piece of fibrocartilage interposed between the acromial end of the clavicle and the acromial process of the scapula.—Circumferential fibrocartilage, a ring of fibrocartilaginous tissue forming a raised rim or border around an articular cavity, which is thus deepened, as about the glenoid fossa of the scapula or the cotyloid fossa of the innominate bone.—Connecting fibrocartilage, fibrocartilaginous tissue connecting apposed surfaces of bones in articulations of slight or no mobility, as between bodies of vertebrae and at the pubic symphysis or sacroiliac synchondrosis.—Interarticular fibrocartilage, any fibrocartilage which is situated in the cavity of an articulation.—Intercoccygeal fibrocartilage, the intervertebral substance between any two vertebrae of the coccyx.—Interpubic fibrocartilage, the interarticular fibrocartilage of the pubic symphysis.—Intervertebral fibrocartilage, the special kind of interarticular fibrocartilage between the bodies of vertebrae, forming disks separating any two bodies, closely adherent to both, tough and fibrous at the periphery, softer, pulpy, and more cartilaginous in the center, and constituting elastic cushions or buffers between the vertebral bodies, increasing the mobility and elasticity of the spinal column, and diminishing the shock of concussion.—Radio-ulnar fibrocartilage, a triangular piece of fibrocartilage between the distal ends of the radius and ulna; also called triangular fibrocartilage.—Sacrococcygeal fibrocartilage, the intervertebral substance between the last sacral and the first coccygeal vertebra.—Semilunar fibrocartilage. Same as semilunar cartilage (which see, under cartilage).

Sternoclavicular fibrocartilage, a piece of fibrocartilage found between the sternal end of the clavicle and the manubrium of the sternum.—Stratiform fibrocartilage, a layer of fibrocartilaginous tissue forming a bed or groove in which the tendon of a muscle lies and glides.

Temporomaxillary fibrocartilage, a piece of fibrocartilage which lies in the articulation between the lower jaw-bone and the glenoid fossa of the temporal bone.

Triangular fibrocartilage. Same as radio-ulnar fibrocartilage.

fibrocartilaginous (fī'brō-kār'tī-lāj'i-nus), a. Having the character of fibrocartilage; consisting of fibrocartilage; as, fibrocartilaginous tissue; a fibrocartilaginous disk.

fibrocellular (fī'brō-sel'ū-lār), a. [< L. fibra, fiber, + E. cellular.] 1. Having fibers and cells; composed of mixed fibrous and cellular tissue; fibro-areolar. All ordinary cellular or areolar connective tissue is strictly fibrocellular.—2. In bot.: (a) Composed of cells the walls of which are marked by thickened bands, ridges, reticulations, etc. [Not in use.] (b) In algology, composed of firm elongated cells which adhere together so as to form a filament-like mass of tissue. Harvey.

fibrochondrosteal (fī'brō-kon-dros'tē-āl), a. [< L. fibra, fiber, + Gr. χονδρος, gristle, + στερναι, bone.] Consisting of fibrous tissue, gristle, and bone.

The whole skeleton then, may be denoted by the term fibrochondrosteal apparatus. Mearns, Elem. Anat., p. 22.

fibrocystic (fī'brō-sis'tik), a. [< L. fibra, fiber, + Gr. κύστη, bladder (E. cyst), + -ic.] Fibroid and cystic; applied to fibroid tumors containing cysts.

fibroferite (fī'brō-fer'it), n. [< L. fibra, fiber, + ferrum, iron, + -ite.] A hydrous sulphate of iron, occurring in delicately fibrous forms of a pale-yellow color.

fibroid (fī'brōid), a. and n. [< L. fibra, fiber, + -oid.] 1. a. Resembling, containing, or taking the form of fiber; fibrous; as, a fibroid tumor.

Fibroid degeneration, phthisis, etc. See the nouns.

II. n. In pathol.: (a) A fibroma. (b) A leiomyoma.

fibroin (fī'brō-in), n. [< L. fibra, fiber (taken in the mod. combining form fibra-), + -in.] The principal chemical constituent of silk, cobwebs, and the horny skeletons of sponges. In the pure state it is white, insoluble in water, ether, acetic acid, etc., but dissolves in an ammoniacal solution of copper, and also in concentrated acids and alkalis.

fibrolite (fī'brō-līt), n. [< L. fibra, fiber, + Gr. λίθος, a stone.] A mineral of a white or gray color and fibrous to columnar structure. It is a subsilicate of aluminium (Al₂SiO₅), and has the same composition as andalusite and cyanite. Also called sillimanite and bucholzite.

fibroma (fī'brō-mā), n.; pl. fibromata (-ma-tā). [NL. < L. fibra, fiber, + -oma.] In pathol., a tumor consisting of connective tissue.

fibromatous (fī'brō-mā'tus), a. [< fibroma(t) + -ous.] Pertaining to or of the nature of a fibroma.

fibromucous (fī'brō-mū'kus), a. [< L. fibra, fiber, + mucosus, mucous.] Having the character of fibrous tissue and mucous membrane; combining fibrous and mucous tissues; applied to mucous membranes backed by firm fibrous tissue.

fibromuscular (fī'brō-mus'kū-lār), a. [< L. fibra, fiber, + musculus, muscle.] Characterized by the presence of both connective and muscular tissue; applied to tumors.

fibromyoma (fī'brō-mī-ō'mā), n.; pl. fibromyomata (-ma-tā). [< L. fibra, fiber, + NL. myoma, q. v.] In pathol.: (a) A leiomyoma. (b) A tumor consisting of fibrous and muscular tissue.

fibromyomatous (fī'brō-mī-om'ā-tus), a. [< fibromyoma(t) + -ous.] Pertaining to or of the nature of a fibromyoma; fibromuscular.

fibroplastic (fī'brō-plas'tik), a. [< L. fibra, fiber, + Gr. πλαστικός, form; see plastic.] Fiber-making; an epithet sometimes applied to tumors usually designated as small spindle-celled sarcomata.

Fibrosa (fī'brō'sā), n. pl. [NL., neut. pl. of fibrosus; see fibrosus.] The fibrous sponges. See Fibrospongia.

fibrosarcoma (fī'brō-sār-kō'mā), n.; pl. fibrosarcomata (-mā-tā). [NL., < L. fibra, fiber, + NL. sarcoma, q. v.] In pathol., a tumor intermediate in character between a fibroma and a sarcoma.

fibrose (fī'brōs), a. Same as fibrous.

fibroserous (fī'brō-sē'rus), a. [< L. fibra, fiber, + E. serous.] Having the character of fibrous tissue and serous membrane; uniting fibrous and serous tissues in one structure. All serous membranes are in fact fibrous in structure, with a serous surface on one side.

fibrosis (fī'brō'sis), n. [NL., < L. fibra, fiber, + -osis.] In pathol., the development in an organ of a substance of fibrous texture.

Changes were found in the inferior cervical ganglia, indicating atrophy and fibrosis. Medical News, LI, 495.

Arterio-capillary fibrosis. See arterio-capillary.

Fibrospongia (fī'brō-spon'jī-ē), n. pl. [NL., < L. fibra, fiber, + spongia, sponge.] One of the principal divisions of the Porifera or Spongia; the fibrous sponges. They present the utmost diversity of form, but agree in the possession of a fibrous skeleton or ceratoid, which may be highly developed and devoid of siliceous spicules, as in the commercial sponges, or inconspicuous in comparison with the richly elaborated and complicated siliceous frames of such genera as Hyattina and Euplectella, the glass-sponges. See cut under Euplectella.

fibrous (fī'brūs), a. [= F. fibræus = Sp. lebroso, fibroso = Pg. It. fibroso; < NL. fibrosus, < L. fibra, fiber; see fiber.] Containing or consisting of fibers; having the character of fibers. Also fibros.

The plants on Pastures, and the puling Springs, Whose fibrous silver thousand Tributaries bring To wealthy Jordan. Sylvestre, II, of Du Bartas's Weeks, II, The Vocation.

The space between these [muscle-cells] and the outer face of the intestine is occupied by a spongy or fibrous substance, which must probably be regarded as a kind of connective tissue. Huxley, Anat. Invert., p. 546.

Fibrous coal. See coal. Fibrous cone. Same as corona radiata (which see, under corona). Fibrous mycelium. See mycelium. Fibrous structure, in mineral, a structure characterized by fine or slender threads, either straight or curved, parallel, diverging, or stellate. Asbestos has, for example, a fibrous structure. Fibrous tissue, the general common connective tissue of the body, composed of largely consisting of white inelastic or yellow elastic fibers, such as the pericardium of bones, the perichondrium of cartilage, the capsules of glands, the meninges of the brain, the ligaments of joints, and the fascia and tendons of muscles. The phrase is sometimes extended to other and special tissues, as the nervous and muscular, which contain or consist of fibers or filaments.

fibrousness (fī'brūs-ness), n. The state or quality of being fibrous. Barley, 1727.

fibrovascular (fī-brō-vas'kū-lār), a. [L. fibra, fiber, + E. vascular,] In anat., consisting of woody fibers and ducts. Fibrovascular bundle. See bundle, 3. Fibrovascular system, the aggregation of fibrovascular tissue in a plant, forming its framework. Also called the fascicular system.

fibster (fīb'stēr), n. [< fib + -ster.] One who tells fibs; a fibber. [Rare.]

fibula (fīb'ū-lā), n.; pl. fibulae (-lō). [L. fibula, a clasp, buckle, pin, latchet, brace, a surgeons' instrument for drawing together the edges of a wound, a stitching-needle, contr. of fibula*, < figere, fasten, fix; see fig.] 1. In archaeol., a clasp or brooch, usually more or less ornamented. Objects of this kind are found among the earliest metallic remains of antiquity.

Rings and fibulae, which are frequently adorned with symbolical devices, might to serve as amulets or charms. Knight, Ancient Art and Myth, p. 65.

2. In surg., a needle for sewing up wounds.—
3. In anat., the outer one of two bones which in most vertebrates (above fishes) extend from the knee to the ankle; so called because in man the bone is very slender, like a clasp or splint applied alongside the tibia. When a fibula is complete, as it usually is, it extends the whole length of the tibia, its foot entering into the composition of the ankle-joint. When reduced, it is usually shortened from below, so that it does not reach the ankle, lying along a part of the tibia, and very frequently ankylized with it; or it may be of full length and ankylized above and below with the tibia, as in many rodents. The human fibula is a slender straight bone, as long as and separate from the tibia, and clubbed at both ends; the upper end is articulated with the tuberosity of the tibia, and excluded from the knee-joint; the lower end is connected with the tibia, and also articulated with the astragalus, thus entering into the ankle-joint, and forming the outer malleolus, or bony protuberance on the outer side of the ankle. Nine muscles are attached to this bone in man. See also cuts under Deformities, Ichthyosaurus, and Tibiotarsus.

F, fibula; T, tibia; P, patella; H, tibia.

4. In masonry, an iron crank used to fasten stones together.—5. [cap.] [NL.] In zool.: (a) A genus of echinoderms. (b) A genus of mollusks.

fibular (fīb'ū-lār), a. [< fibula + -ar2.] Of or pertaining to the fibula; peroneal; as, a fibular artery; a fibular nerve.

fibulare (fīb'ū-lārē), n.; pl. fibularia (-rī-ā). [NL., < fibula, q. v.] The outermost bone of the proximal row of tarsal bones, articulating or in morphological relation with the fibula; generally called the os calcis, calcaneum, or heel-bone. In man and mammals generally the fibula is the largest tarsal bone, but its size and shape are very variable. See cut under foot.

fibulocalcaneal (fīb'ū-lō-kal-kā'nō-āl), a. Pertaining to the fibula and to the calcaneum; as, "a fibulocalcaneal articulation or ligament," Coues.

-fic. [L. -ficus, in compound adjectives, < facere, make; see fact and -fy.] A terminal element in adjectives of Latin origin, meaning 'making'; as, petrific, making into stone; terrific, making affrighted; horrific, making to shudder, etc. Such adjectives are usually accompanied by derived verbs in -fy, and often by nouns thence derived in -fication. Exceed the Fictions of Heroic Fables.

Saunders, tr. of De Bartsas Works, ii. The Fathers.

Is it not monstrous that this player here,

But in a fiction, in a dream of passion,

Could force his soul so to his own conceit?

Shak., Hamlet, ii. 2.

This is a very ancient riddle, if the tradition of Antenor's being the founder be not a fiction.

Erskine, Diary, June, 1847.

Nor do I perceive that any one shrinks from telling fictions to children, on matters upon which it is thought well that they should not know the truth.

H. Sidgwick, Methods of Ethics, p. 207.

4. In literature: (a) A prose work (not dramatic) of the imagination in narrative form; a story; a novel.

One important rule belongs to the composition of a fiction, which I suppose the writers of fiction seldom think of, viz., never to fabricate or introduce a character to whom greater talents or wisdom is attributed than the author himself possesses; if he does, how shall this character be sustained? J. T. Coe, in Evarts, p. 231.

(b) Collectively, literature consisting of imaginative narration; story-telling.

No kind of literature is so attractive as fiction.

Quarterly Rev.

The only work of fiction, in all probability with which he [Lunyan] could compare his plumed, was his old favourite, the legend of Sir Bevis of Southampton. . . . He saw that, in employing fiction to make truth clear and goodness attractive, he was only following the example which every Christian ought to propose to himself. Macaulay, Euynan.

(c) In a wide sense, not now current, any literary product of the imagination, whether in prose or verse, or in a narrative or dramatic form, or such works collectively.—5. In law, the intentional assuming as a fact of what is not such (the truth of the matter not being considered), for the purpose of administering justice without contravening settled rules or making apparent exceptions: a legal device for reforming or extending the application of the law without appearing to alter the law itself. Inasmuch as the courts do not alter the law, but only declare it and apply it to facts ascertained by them, it was early discovered that the only way in which they could adapt the law to hard cases, or stretch it to new cases, was by pretending a state of facts to fit the rule of law it was thought just to apply. Thus it was a rule of law that a deed takes effect from delivery, and the courts had no power to alter this rule, but if a grantor fraudulently or negligently delayed in delivering his deed at the time it bore date, and afterward sought to claim some unjust advantage, as having lost the deed, the courts, not being able to change the rule of law, would by a fiction treat the delivery as relating back to the date. So, when legislation made transfers of land unless made publicly by record, the courts allowed an intending grantee to sue, alleging that the land belonged to him, and the intending grantor to suffer judgment to pass; thus by a fiction creating a mode of conveyance which, for all practical purposes, preserved the privacy of titles. Direct methods of improving the rules and forms of law have in recent times superseded the invention, and for the most part the use, of fictions.

I employ the expression "Legal Fiction" to signify any assumption which conceals, or affects to conceal, the fact that a rule of law has undergone alteration, its letter remaining unchanged, its operations being modified.

Maine, Ancient Law, p. 26.

=Syn. 3. Fabrication, figment, fable, untruth, falsehood. fictional (fik'shon-al), a. [< fiction + -al.] Pertaining to or of the nature of fiction; fictitiously created; imaginary.

fictor (fik'tor), n. [< L. fictor, one who makes images of clay, wax, stone, etc., a baker of offering-cakes, a maker, a feigner, < fictus, pp. of fingere, form, fashion, feign: see fictum.] An artist who works in wax, clay, or other plastic material, as distinguished from one who works in bronze, marble, ivory, or other solid substance.

Ficula (fik'ū-lā), n. [NL., dim. of L. ficus, a fig: see fig.] A genus of gastropods, of the family Pygidiidae; the fig-shells or pear-shells; so named from their shape. The genus includes tropical and subtropical active carnivorous species. Also called Pygula. See ent under fig-shell.

Ficulidæ (fik'ū-lī-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Ficula + -idæ.] A family of gastropods, typified by the genus Ficula: same as Pygidiidæ.

Ficus (fik'us), n. [L., a fig-tree, a fig: see fig.] 1. In bot., a very large genus of tropical and subtropical trees or shrubs, of the urticaceous tribe Artocarpæ, characterized by bearing their minute unisexual flowers within a nearly closed globose or pear-shaped receptacle. The genus is remarkable for the peculiar arrangement by which cross-fertilization is effected through the agency of insects.

There are always three forms of flowers, the staminate, the pistillate, and a third, the gall-form, which resembles the pistillate but is incapable of fertilization, and is usually occupied by the pupa of a species of Blasphogaster or other hymenopterous insect. In a large group of species the three forms are found within the same receptacle; but in much the larger number, as in the common fig, the female flowers are in one receptacle and the male and gall flowers together in another. The perfect insect is formed synchronously with the maturity of the pollen of the male flowers, through which it makes its way and escapes by a perforation made at the apex of the receptacle. In what way it conveys the pollen to the pistillate flowers in the closed female receptacle is not understood, but it is believed that it is done, and that by this means only the female flowers are fertilized. Generally the barren and fertile receptacles are upon the same tree and are similar in appearance, but in the common fig they are upon separate trees, and differ so much in form that the sterile, known as the wild fig or caprifig, has been considered by many botanists as a species distinct from the other. There are about 600 species, the greater number belonging to the islands of the Indian and Pacific oceans, though there are many in tropical America. Three or four species are found in Florida. The genus includes the common fig (F. Carica), the banana (F. Lænitissima), the India rubber tree (F. elastica), etc. The wood is generally soft and valueless. See fig, and ent under banana.

2. In zool., an old genus of mollusks: same as Pygula. Klein, 1753.—3. [L. c.] In surg., a fleshy excrescence, often soft and reddish, sometimes hard, hanging by a peduncle or formed like a fig. It occurs on the eyelids, chin, tongue, anus, or reproductive organs.

Also called fig-wart. Ficus ungatum (dens of the hawk), a chronic paronychia in which the posterior wall of the nail becomes thickened and exerted.

fid (fid), n. [Also written fidle; origin obscure, D. fid, fid, a skin, appears to be a different word. See fidle.] 1. A small thick lump. [Prov. Eng.]=2. A piece or plug of tobacco. [Colloq.]

3. A bar of wood or metal used to support or steady anything.—4. Naut.: (a) A square bar of wood or iron, with shoulder at one end, used to support a topmast or topgallantmast when swayed up into place. The fid passes through a square hole in the heel of its mast, and its ends rest on the trestle-trees. (b) A conical pin of hard wood, from 12 to 24 inches long, and from 1 to 3 inches in diameter at the butt, used to open the strands of rope in splicing.—

When the iron-strapped cutting-blocks are used, the fid is discarded, the tail of the chain-strap being moused in the sister-blocks.—Setting-fid, a large cone of hard wood or iron, used by riggers and sailmakers to stretch eyes of rigging, cringles, etc.—Splicing-fid. See def. 4 (b).

fid (fid), v. t.; pret. and pp. fidled, ppr. fidding. [< fid, n.] Naut., to sway into place and secure (a topmast or topgallantmast) by its fid. Also fidle.

Various plans have been devised for fidding and unfid-ding topmasts without going aloft.

Quailtrough, Boat-Sailer's Manual, p. 203.

fiddle (fid'l), n. [Early mod. E. also fille; < ME. fidel, fidyll, fedele, usually and prop. with th. fidlel, fidlele, < AS. fithle* (not found, but the derivatives fithla, a fiddler, fithlere, a fiddler, fithlestre, a female fiddler, occur) = D. vedel, veel = OHG. fidula, MHG. vidlele, videl, G. fidel = veel, fidla = OSw. fidla = Dan. fidlel, a fiddle; appar. connected with ML. vitula, vidula, a fiddle, whence also the Rom. forms, OF. viola, vielle, vielle, F. viola (> E. viol, and the modified Sw. Dan. fiol) = Pr. viola, viola = Sp. Pg. viola = It. viola (whence E. viola), dim. violino (whence E. violin, etc.). The ML. vitula, which was sometimes called vitula jocosca, the merry viol, is referred by Diez to L. vitulari, celebrate a festival, keep holiday (orig. perhaps 'sacrifice a calf', < vitulus, a calf: see veal). It is possible that the ML. vitula is an accom. form of the Teut. word; cf. LL. harpa, It. arpa, F. harpe, etc., harp, of Teut. origin. Another derivation, < L. fidicula, commonly pl. fidicula, a small stringed instrument, a small lute or cithern (dim. of fidis, a stringed instrument, a lute, lyre, cithern), hardly agrees with the Teut. and not at all with the Rom. forms.] 1. A musical stringed instrument of the viol class; a violin. See viol, violin, crowd. This is the proper English name, but among musicians it has been superseded by violin, the name fiddle, except in popular language, being used humorously or in slight contempt.

Harpe and fithell bothe thay fande,

Getterne, and als so the sawtrey.

Thomas of Ersseldoune (Child's Ballads, I, 106).

For hym was leveire have at his beddes heed

Stead, Sports and Pastimes, p. 268.

2. Naut., a contrivance to prevent things from rolling off the table in bad weather. It is made of small cords passed through wooden bridges and hauled very taut. Same as rack.—3. In wool-carding, an implement used in Yorkshire, England, for smoothing the points of card-clothing and dislodging dirt from among the teeth. It consists of a piece of emery covered cloth stretched between two end pieces of wood connected by a curved handle. Fine as a fiddle. See fine. Scotch fiddle, the fiddle so called from the action of the arm in scratching, and the prevalence of the disease in Scotland. (Humorous.)

To play first (or second) fiddle. (a) In an orchestra, to take the part of the first (or second) violin player; hence. (b) To take a leading (or subordinate) part in any project or undertaking. [Colloq.]

To say that Tom had no idea of playing first fiddle in any social orchestra, but was always quite satisfied to be set down for the hundred and fiftieth violin in the band, or therabouts, is to express his modesty in very inadequate terms.

Dickens, Martin Chuzzlewit, xli.

It was evident that since John Marston's arrival he had been phoney, with regard to Mary, second fiddle, if you can possibly be induced to pardon the extreme coarseness of the expression.

H. Kingsley, Ravenshoe, lviii.

Themistocles . . . said "he could not fiddle, but he could make a small town a great city."

Bacon, True Greatness of Kingdoms and Estates (ed. 1887).

This man could not fiddle, could not time himself to be pleasant and plausible to all companies.

Fidler, Worthies, Lancashire.

Hence — 2. To scrape, as one stretched string upon another.

One of the most essential points in a good micrometer is that all the webs shall be so nearly in the same plane as to be well in focus together under the highest powers used, and at the same time absolutely free from fiddling.

Engine, Brit., XVI, 241.

3. To play (upon), in a figurative sense. [Rare.]

What dost (thou) think I am, that thou shouldst fiddle So much upon my patience?

Ford, Lover's Melancholy, v. 1.

4. To move the hands or other objects over one another or about in an idle or ineffective way.

The ladies walked, talking, and fiddling with their hats and feathers.

Peppys, Diary.

5. To be busy with trifles; trifle; do something requiring considerable pains and patience without any adequate result.

II. trans. 1. To play on, in a figurative sense.

The devil fiddle them! I am glad they are going.

Shaks., Hen. VIII., i. 3.

2. To play (a tune) on a fiddle.

fiddle-block (fid'l-blok), n. [Naut., a long block having two sheaves of different diameters in the same plane, not, as in the usual form, side by side, but one above the other.

fiddle-bow (fid'l-bo), n. A bow strung with horse-hair with which the strings of the violin or a similar instrument are set in vibration. Also fiddlestick. See cut under violin.

fiddlecum, fiddlecume (fid'l-kum), n. [CF. fiddle-cum-fiddle, fiddle-de-dee.] Nonsensical.

Do you think such a fine proper gentleman as he cares for a fiddlecum tale of a drizzle-tailed girl?

Farquhar, Relapse, iv. 1.

fiddle-cum-fiddle, fiddle-come-fiddle (fid'l-kum-fad'l), n. Same as fiddle-fiddle.

Boys must not be their own choosers; . . . they have their sympathies and fiddle-cum-fiddles in their brain, and know not what they would ha' themselves.

Carben, Cutter of Coleman Street.

fiddle-de-dee (fid'l-dē-dē), interj. [Loosely connected with fiddle-fiddle and fiddlestick; used in the same way in allusion to fiddle, which in popular use carries with it a suggestion of contempt and ridicule; hardly, as has been suggested, a corruption of the lt. exclamation fiddio, lit. God's faith.] Nonsense! an exclamation used in dismissing a remark as silly or trifling.

All the return he ever had . . . was a word, too common, I regret to say, in female lips, viz., fiddle-de-dee.

De Quincey, Secret Societies, i.

fiddle-faddle (fid'l-fad'l), v. i. [A varied reduplication of fiddle, expressing contempt; see fiddle-de-dee. CF. fiffal, a shorter form.] To trifle; busy one's self with nothing; talk trifling nonsense; dawdle; dally.

Ye may as easily

Outrun a cloud, driven by a northern blast.

As fiddle-fiddle so. Each, Broken Heart, i. 3.

1. One who plays a fiddle, violin, or some similar instrument; a violinist.

Nought to have as a fiddler or a fere, for to seek testes.

Piers Plowman (B), A. 92.

In the king of the fiddlers.

Robin Hood's Birth (Child's Ballads, V, 354).

What music will be in him when Hector has knocked out his brains, I know not, . . . unless the fiddler Apollo gets his snaws to make catlings on.

Shaks., T. and C., iii. 3.

2. A sumpence. [Eng. slang.] — 3. In the United States, a fiddler-crab.

Fiddlers, which the inexperienced visitor might at first mistake for so many peculiar beetles, as they run about side ways, each with his huge single claw tumbled upon his body like a wing-case.

Harper's Mon., LXXVI, 735.

4. The common sandpiper, Feingades hypoleucos, so called from its habit of balancing the body as if on a pivot. The corresponding species in the United States, T. macularius, is for the same reason called teetotal or tip-up. Fiddler's fare, meat, drink, and money.

Yes, did your ladyship play? Lady Sm. Yes, and won; so I came off with fiddler's fare, meat, drink, and money.

Scott, Polite Conversation, iii.

Fiddler's green, a name given by sailors to their dance-houses and other places of frolic on shore; sailors' paradise. Fiddler's money, a lot of small silver coins, such small coin being the remuneration paid to fiddlers in old times by each of the company. Fiddler's muscle. See fideinodis.

fiddler-crab (fid'l-er-krah), n. A small crab of the genus Gelasimus, as G. vocans or G. pugilator; a calling-crab; so called from the waving or brandishing of the odd large claw, as if fiddling. They are useful for bait, and injurious by burrowing into and weakening levees and dunes. See cut under Gelasimus.

fiddle-shaped (fid'l-shāpt), a. Having the form of a fiddle or violin; pandurate or panduriform; applied in botany to an obovate leaf which is contracted above the base.

fiddlestick (fid'l-stik), n. [ME. fiddylstyk; cf. fiddle + stick, n.] 1. Same as fiddle-bow.

Here's my fiddlestick; here's that shall make you dance. Shaks., R. and J., iii. 1.

2. A mere nothing; chiefly as an exclamation, nonsense! fiddle-de-dee! often in the plural, fiddlesticks!

You are strangely frightened;

Shot with a fiddlestick! whos here to shoot you?

Fletcher, Pilgrim, iii. 4.

At such an assertion he would have exclaimed: A fiddlestick! Why and how that word has become an interjection of contempt I must leave those to explain who can.

Southern, The Doctor, clxxviii.

She was to marry her cousin, Tom Pointz, when they were both very young, and proposed to die of a broken heart when I arranged her match with Mr. Newcome. A broken fiddlestick! she would have ruined Tom Pointz in a year.

Thackeray, Newcomes, x.

The devil rides on a fiddlestick. See devil.

fiddle-string (fid'l-string), n. A string for a fiddle or violin.

fiddle-tree, n. Same as fiddlewood.

fiddlewood (fid'l-wid), n. [Formerly also fiddle-tree; cf. fiddle + wood (or tree).] The F. name (as the NL generic name Citharexylum, which is a translation of fiddlewood) existed before 1692, and appar. originated in Barbados or Jamaica. The wood was said at that time to be used in making fiddles. The notion that the name is a half-translation, half-perversion of F. hous fiddle, 'staunch or faithful wood,' in allusion to its durability, finds record in Miller's "Gardener's Diet." (1759) (where the "French" name is given as "fiddle wood"), but lacks evidence. The F. fiddle does not mean 'staunch' except as a synonym of 'faithful,' and is prop., like F. faithful, a subjective term, not applicable to inert objects. Its orig. L. fidelis, faithful, etc., has, however, the objective sense staunch, strong, durable, etc.] A common name for West Indian species of Citharexylum, and trees of allied genera, as C. quadrangulum, C. villosum (which is also found in southern Florida), Viter umbrosa, Petitot Domingensis, etc. The wood is heavy, hard, and strong, and is used in building.

fiddling (fid'ling), n. [Verbal n. of fiddle, v.] 1. The act or practice of playing on the fiddle.

We see Nero's fiddling, and Commodus's skill in fencing, on several of their medals. Addison, Ancient Medals, iii.

2. Trifling; useless or unimportant doings; fidgeting with the fingers or hands.

Those degenerate arts and shifts, whereby many counsellors and governors gain both favour with their masters and estimation with the vulgar, deserve no better name than fiddling, being things rather pleasing for the time, and grateful to themselves only, than tending to the weal and advancement of the state.

Bacon, True Greatness of Kingdoms and Estates (ed. 1887).

fiddling (fid'ling), v. a. [For. of fiddle, v.] Trifling; trivial; fussily busy with nothing.

Good cooks cannot abide what they justly call fiddling work, where abundance of time is spent, and little done.

fidelet, a. [CF. fidelis, F. fidelis, L. fidelis, faithful, that may be trusted, trusty, true, cf. fides, faith, trust; see faith. CF. fidet, a doublet of fidelis.] Faithful; loyal.

We not only made his [Poles'] whole family of knight, but enhanced them to so high nobility and honour as they have been so long as they were true and fidelis to us.

Hen. VIII. to Sir T. Wyatt, March 10, 1539.

fidelity (fi-del'i-ti), n. [CF. fidelis = Pr. fidelis = Sp. fidelidad = Pg. fidelidade = It. fidelità, fidelita, fidelita, L. fidelitas, faithfulness, firm adherence, trustiness, cf. fidelis, faithful; see fidelis. CF. fidely, a doublet of fidelity.] 1. Good faith; careful and exact observance of duty or performance of obligations; as, conjugal or official fidelity.

I experienced in this brave Arab such an extraordinary instance of fidelity as is rarely to be met with.

Poore, Description of the East, I, 114.

Constancy, fidelity, bounty, and generous honesty, are the gems of noble minds.

Sir T. Browne, Christ, Mor., i. 36.

2. Faithful devotion or submission; unwavering adherence; close or exact conformity; fidelity; allegiance; as, fidelity to a husband or wife, or to a trust; fidelity to one's principles or to instructions; the dog is the type of fidelity.

The fidelity of the allies of Rome, which had not been shaken by the defeat of Thrasybulus, could not resist the tery trial of Canine.

De, Arnold, Hist. Rome, xlv.

Verbal translations are always inelegant, because always destitute of beauty of idiom and language. For by their fidelity to an author's words they become treacherous to his reputation.

Grainger, Advertisement to Elegies of Tibullus.

3. Faithful adherence to truth or reality; strict conformity to fact; truthfulness; exactness; accuracy; as, the fidelity of a witness, of a narrative, or of a picture. Order of Fidelity. [An order of the duchy of Baden, founded by the margrave Charles William in 1715. It is still in existence, and consists of two classes only, that of grand cross and that of commander. The badge is a cross of eight points in red enamel, having between each two arms the cipher C. W., the same cipher occupies the middle of the cross with the motto Fidelity. The ribbon is scarlet-colored and edged with blue.] (b) An order of merit, founded by John VI. in 1823 for the supporters of the monarchy during the insurrectionary movements in that country = Syn. Faith, integrity, trustiness, trustworthiness, conscientiousness. Constantin, Faithfulness, etc. (see cut).

fides (fi-dēz), n. [L., faith, personified Faith; see faith.] 1. Faith. — 2. [cap.] In Rom. myth., the goddess of faith or fidelity, commonly represented as a matron wearing a wreath of olive- or laurel-leaves, and having in her hand ears of corn or a basket of fruit. Bona fides, good faith. Malis fides, bad faith.

fidfad (fid'fad), n. [E. dial., a tribe, a triber; see fiddle-fiddle and fidl.] A contraction of fiddle-fiddle.

fidge (fidj), v. pret. and pp. fidged, pp. fidging. [Assimilated form of fidl, this being another form of fidl, *fidl*²; see fidl, fidl, and *fidl*². Hence freq. fidjet.] 1. intrins. To fidget. [Now only Scotch.]

Speech is like cloth of Arras, opened and put abroad, whereby the imagery doth appear in figure; whereas in thoughts they be but as in packs. Bacon.

9. In logic, the form of a syllogism with respect to the relative position of the middle term. In the second figure the middle term is predicate of both premises; in the third figure it is the subject of both. Some logicians admit only three figures, and they define the first figure as having the middle term the subject of one premise and the predicate of the other. Other logicians admit four figures, and define the first as having the middle term the subject of that premise which contains the predicate of the conclusion, and the predicate of the other premise; while the fourth figure has the middle term the subject of that premise which contains the subject of the conclusion, and the predicate of the other.

10. In astrology, a diagram which represents the heavens at any time; a scheme; a horoscope; also, a diagram used in the practice of geomancy.

She works by charms, by spells, by the figure, and such dautery as this is, beyond our element. Shak., M. W. of W., iv. 2.

He set a figure to discover If you were fled to Eye or Dover. S. Butler, Hudibras, III. i. 455.

11. A movement of a dancer; one of the regular divisions of a dance, comprising a special set of evolutions, and separated from the next movement by a slight pause.

He did not announce the name of the dance, . . . the officers teaching the English girls the figure. E. K. Hale, Man Without a Country.

12. In music: (a) A short theme or motive having a distinct rhythmic, melodic, or harmonic individuality, which is often the germ of extended movements; usually, the shortest complete idea or form into which a phrase can be divided without being reduced to separate tones. (b) A numeral subjoined to a written bass to indicate briefly the nature of the unwritten harmony. See figured bass, under bass. —13. Any significant written or printed character other than a letter; specifically, an arithmetical character, especially one of the Arabic figures, the nine digits and the cipher; sometimes used of a digit, as distinguished from a cipher; as, a full figure.

The tale of an hundred . . . betokeneth one rounde figure, that is the mayeste among alle the othere figures; for ase in the rounde figure the ende went agen to his ginninge, . . . also the tale of an hundred pyneth than ende to the ginninge. Apocalypse of Invent (E. E. T. S.), p. 234.

A crooked figure may Attest, in little place a million. Shak., Hen. V., 4. (cho.).

You see the use of the cipher (for so the figure 0 is peculiarly named, although it is generally called and accounted as a figure). T. Holl, Arithmetic (1600), fol. 5.

14. Value, as expressed in numbers; price; as, the goods were sold at a high figure.

Accommodating a youngster, who had just entered the regiment, with a gilded charger at an unseasonably stiff figure. Thackeray, Book of Snobs, x.

15. A mystical type; an antecedent symbol or emblem; that which prefigures or represents a coming reality.

There went Agents of ye old lawe and the newe, joyninge together the figures of the blessed sacrament in such a nombre and soe apt and comelynt for that feeste yt it wolde make any man poyous to se it. Sir R. Gifford, Fylersimage, p. 8.

The Flees [fleeces] of Edome with dewe delectable Was of Marya a figure fulle notable. Political Poems, etc. (ed. Furnivall), p. 17.

This was the swene which he had, That Daniell anone arad, And said hym, that figure strange Betokeneth how the world shall change. Gower, Conf. Amant., Prolog.

Nevertheless, death reigned from Adam to Moses, even over them that had not sinned after the similitude of Adam's transgression, who is the figure of him that was to come. Rom. v. 14.

16. In rhet., a peculiar or special use of words; employment of words in forms, combinations, or meanings different from those properly or ordinarily assigned to them; use of certain forms of speech to produce a special effect. An unintentional, unauthorized or unjustifiable deviation from grammatical usage is not a figure, but a solecism. The names of most of the figures of rhetoric are inherited from the terms used by the ancient Greek and Roman grammarians and rhetoricians. Also called figure of speech.

Figure it selfe is a certayne kind of good grace set upon wordes, speeches, and sentences, to some purpose and not in vaine, giving them ornament or pleasure by many manner of alterations in shape, in sound, and also in sense. Pattenham, Arte of Eng. Poesie, p. 133.

And these things, brethren, I have in a figure transferred to myself and to Apollon for your sakes. 1 Cor. ix. 9.

There motley images her fancy strike, Peaces ill pair d, and smiles milke. Pope, Dunciad, l. 96.

The most illiterate speak in figures as often as the most learned. H. Rhot, Rhetoric, xiv.

And now I think, you shall hear some better language: I was obliged to be plain and intelligible in the first scene, because there was so much matter of fact in it; but now, I faith, you have trope, figure, and no taper as plenty as noun substantives. Sheridan, The Critic, ii. 2.

17. An image; a fancy; a product of the imagination.

If it be but to scrape the figures out of your husband's brains. Shak., M. W. of W., iv. 2.

Where beams of warm imagination play, The memory's soft figures fade away. Pope, Essay on Criticism, l. 59.

Form, Configuration, Figure, Shape, Fashion. Form is the general word; and its use in ordinary speech has been much influenced by its metaphysical meaning, so that it is the least geometrical of these words. When form refers to the outward, it generally suggests the substance of the person or thing whose form it is; form may also be used in composition to spice or substantiate, as, "a form of godliness." 2 Tim. iii. 5. Configuration is the result of the arrangement of the parts of a whole, and the word suggests the proportion and relation of the parts, internal or external, to each other. Figure, shape, and fashion are external; the first is often, and the others are generally, the result of art. Figure has a wide range of meaning, from mere outline to pictorial or literary representation. Shape has almost as much freedom of use; yet, having been little used as a learned term, it is more literally geometrical, and at the same time more loosely employed. Fashion, in the sense of form is obsolete.

B. Jonson, Poetaster, v. 1.

4. To imagine; image in the mind.

If Love, alas! be Pain, the Pain I bear

No Thought can figure, and no Tongue declare.

Prior, Henry and Emma.

Figure to yourself a Roman villa, all its little apartments thrown open, and lighted up to the best advantage.

Gray, Letters, l. 76.

5t. To prefigure; foreshow.

Three glorious suns, each one a perfect sun, . . .

In this the heaven figures some event.

Shak., 3 Hen. VI., ii. 1.

6. To mark with or note by significant figures; mark or indicate significantly or numerically; as, to figure the dial of a clock, or the hours on the dial; to figure the bass in music to show the intended harmony.

As through a crystal glass the figured hours are seen.

Deidren.

7. To set down or reckon up in numerical figures; make a calculation of; as, to figure, figure up, or figure out costs, profits, or losses. [Colloq.]—8. In music: (a) To embellish by adding passing-notes or other decorations, especially definite figures much repeated. (b) See def. 6, and figured bass, under bass.

II. intrans. 1. To make a figure; show one's self; be seen or prominent; take a part.

The gentlemen, in fact, who joined in the circles of the gay world in these ancient times, corresponded, in most particulars, with the beautiful damsels whose smiles they were adulations to deserve.

Irving, Knickerbocker, p. 175.

Know, who is to figure so grandly in another and greater work, drifts as a gloomy and portentous shadow across the scene.

Shelton, Vict. Poets, p. 404.

He [Correggio] paints the three Fates like young and joyous Bacchantes. Place rose-garlands and thyrsi in their hands instead of the distaff and the thread of human destiny; and they might figure appropriately upon the panels of a banquet chamber in Pompeii.

J. A. Saunders, Italy and Greece, p. 272.

Though he tries to figure as a martyr, he is only that stock character, the horrid example.

Nineteenth Century, XX, 550.

2. To cipher; work by means of figures; make a calculation; as, to figure at a problem; to figure upon a proposed bargain. [Colloq.]

1. By this figure-caster, must be imagined in such distress as to sue to Madonna.

Milton, Apology for Smectymnus.

figure-casting (fig'ūr-kās'ting), n. The art of preparing casts of human or animal forms and of various other complex objects. A figure is first roughly formed in wax, clay, plaster, or other suitable material which cures, as the core. If the core is fusible, it can be reduced to a heat. The mold is formed directly upon the core, and when it is perfectly dry and hard it is placed in a heat sufficient to melt or incrust the core. The removal of which leaves a cavity for the metal of the cast. This method gives a solid casting, and therefore suitable for small work only; moreover, the model itself may be re-used. Expensive casts of natural objects, such as the human figure, can be made by the lost wax process. If the core cannot be removed, the model itself is made in parts to be put together.

figured (fig'ūr'd), p. a. 1. Depicted; represented; as, a figured statue.

1. A figured statue in wax of silver-cold.

Pope, Windsor Forest, l. 275.

2. Adorned with figures; said of any manner of figured articles, but especially of those which are intended for surface-decoration of which themselves are decorated superficially; as, figured silk; figured muslin; a figured wall-paper.

In the manufactures, a figured cannet, stuff, tabby, etc., is that wherein there are divers designs of flowers, figures, branches, etc., impressed by means of hot irons.

Chambers's Cyc., 1741.

3t. Figurative.

Figured and metaphorical expressions do well to illustrate more abstruse and unfamiliar ideas, which the mind is not yet thoroughly accustomed to.

Loeke, Conduct of the Understanding, § 32.

4. In music, same as figurate, 3.—5. In her., bearing the human face or features; indicating the face as a roundel, especially the sun or moon.—Figured bass. See bass 3.—Figured counterpoint. See counterpoint 2, 3.—Figured harmony, muslin, etc. See the nouns.—Figured syllogism, a syllogism expressed so that the subject and predicate of each premise are distinguished from each other, and the syllogism belongs to a definite figure.

The grand figure-dances, and ballettes of action, as they are called, of the modern times, most probably surpass in splendour the ancient exhibitions of dancing.

figurehead (fig'ūr-hed), n. 1. An ornamental figure, as a statue or bust, on the projecting part of the head of a ship, over the cutwater and immediately under the bowsprit. If the vessel's name is that of a person, object, etc., which can be represented directly or emblematically by a figure, such a figure is usually placed at the head of the vessel; thus, the Columbus would have a bust or statue of Columbus for a figurehead, the Lion would have the figure of a lion, the Britannia a statue or bust of the conventional Britannia. When no figure is used, the head is often finished off as a scroll head or a fiddle head (see these terms), which are not strictly figureheads.

Her full bustled figure-head

Stared o'er the ripple feathering from her bows.

Templeton, Enoch Arden.

2. Figuratively, a person put forward to represent or to appear to act for others, without having any real authority or responsibility.

To many these kings and heroes seem nothing but the figure-heads of the centuries, which may ornament the high prow of the times, but which are powerless to direct the course of the vessel.

Westminster Rev., CXXV, 2.

figure-stone (fig'ūr-stōn), n. 1. Same as agal-matohle.—2. A stone having or resembling the form of some object, or marked with lines having such a resemblance. Such stones, in which the representation is often very fanciful, have sometimes been objects of superstitious veneration.

figural (fig'ūr-āl), a. [An improper form of figural.] Represented by figure or delineation. Figural.

figurine (fig'ūr-nē'), n. [F. figurine (= fig. figurina) = fig. figurina, a dimin. of figura, figure.] A figure, or group of figures, in any material, small and of ornamental character; specifically, such a figure in pottery or metal work. The figures of porcelain or pottery not painted or glazed being called biscuits, the term figurine is often reserved for those adorned with painting and gilding, as in the Dresden figures commonly seen. Figurines are especially abundant among the ancient remains of Greece, Egypt, Assyria, etc.

After Alexander, from whose time dates the ornamentation of the tombs with figurines, Tanagra became the flourishing center of its province. The Century, XXI, 911.

Tanagra figurine, in archaeol., one of the small terra-cotta figures of divinities or mortals, or of animals, found in various quantity and perfection throughout Greek lands,

These figures were in great demand among the Greeks as household ornaments, and it was usual to present them as offerings in temples, and to bury several of them with a dead body. They were, as a rule, cast in molds and then finished, often very delicately, by hand, and after the baking they were brilliantly colored. In them is preserved a charming memorial of Greek private life in its various phases, such as the games of the children and the occupations of the women. They are commonly known as Tanagra figurines, because those first brought into public notice, as well as some of the most beautiful examples since found, come from the cemetery of Tanagra in Boeotia.

Figurine from Tanagra, 4th century B. C.—Museum of Fine Arts, Boston.

figuring (fig'ūr-ing), n. [ME. figuryng; verbal n. of figure, v.] 1. The act or process of using figures, especially in computation; as, close figuring.—2t. Figure; figuration; beauty of form.

fiky (fik'i), a. [See, < fike² + -y.] Causing or giving trouble, especially about trifles; finical; unduly particular; troublesome in regard to matters of no consequence; as, fiky work; a fiky body.

fil¹. An obsolete preterit of fall¹. Chaucer.

fil², n. An obsolete form of filly.

A fil of the same race, both sire and dam, begotten by the father of lies upon a slanderous tongue, and so sent post about the world to tell false tidings of the English.

Abp. Sowerby, Consecration Sermon, 1660.

fila, n. Plural of filum.

filacet, n. [< OF. filace, filasse (ML. filacium), a file for papers (cf. filas, a net, F. filasse, tow), < L. filum, thread; see fil³.] A file or thread on which the records of the courts of justice were strung. Hallieck.

filaceous (fi-lā'shi-us), a. [< L. filum, a thread, + -aceous.] Composed or consisting of thread or thread-like parts; filamentous.

It is the stalk that maketh the filaceous matter, commonly. Bacon, Nat. Hist., § 614.

filacer (fil'ā-sēr), n. [Also written filazer; < OF. filacier, filassier, < filace, filasse, a file for papers; see filace.] A former officer in the English Court of Common Pleas, who filed original writs, etc., and made out processes on them.

Filago (fi-lā'gō), n. [NL. < L. filum, a thread; see fil³.] A genus of low, annual, cottony herbs, belonging to the Compositæ, and nearly related to Gnaphalium. There are 8 or 10 widely distributed species, 3 of which are found on the Pacific coast of North America. The cotton-rose or herb impious of Europe, F. germanica, is also naturalized in the United States.

filament (fil'a-ment), n. [= F. filamentum = Sp. Pg. It. filamento; < NL. filamentum, < ML. filare, wind thread, spin, < L. filum, thread; see fil³.]

1. A fine untwisted thread; a separate fiber or fibril of any vegetable or animal tissue or product, natural or artificial, or of a fibrous mineral; as, a filament of silk, wool, cobweb, or asbestos; a cortical or muscular filament.

He [Darwin] suggests the possibility that all warm-blooded animals have arisen from one living filament, which the Great First Cause endued with animality. H. Spencer, Prin. of Biol., § 141.

It is suggested that the excitement of any single filament of the cochlear nerve gives rise in the mind to a distinct musical impression.

Huxley and Fyfe, Physiol., § 258.

Specifically—2. In bot., the support of an anther, usually slender and stalk-like, but very variable in form.—3. In ornith., the part of a down-feather corresponding to the barb of an ordinary feather. Macgillivray.—4. A tenuous thread of any substance, as glass or muscus; hence, in med., a glairy substance sometimes contained in urine, capable of being drawn out into threads or strings.—5. The nearly infusible conductor placed in the globe of an incandescent lamp or glow-lamp and raised to incandescence by the passage of the current. It is usually some form of carbon, although metals with high points of fusion have been used. Filament of Needham, the spermatophore or spermatic cartridge of a cephalopod. See spermato-phore. Gastric filaments, mesenteric filaments, in arachnids, filamentous structures which project into the central cavity of the gastrovascular system, as, for example, in the Tricophora. Spermatic filament, a spermatozoon; so called from its fine thread-like shape. Urticating filament, the thread of a thread-cell or emula, a cnidoblast. See cut under cnida.

filamentar (fil'a-men'tār), a. [< filament + -ar².] Filamentary.

Even such slips of mesentery as are at no point in contact with the stomodæum often exhibit a filamentar (respectively) thickening. Jour. Micros. Science, XXVIII. 45.

filamentary (fil'a-men'tā-ri), a. [< filament + -ary.] Having the character of or formed by a filament.

In the blennies, the forked lake, the forked beard, and some other fishes, the ventral fins are reduced to filamentary feelers. Owen, Anat.

Any substance capable of yielding a certain continuous and uninterrupted length of filamentary matter may be called textile fibre.

W. Crookes, Dyeing and Calico-printing, p. 16.

filamented (fil'a-men-ted), a. [< filament + -ed².] Provided with filaments or filamentary processes.

The cells were larger and were not filamented.

filamentiferous (fil'a-men-tif'è-rus), a. [< NL. filamentum, filament + L. ferre = F. bear¹.] Bearing a filament or filaments; filiferous.

filamentoid (fil'a-men'toid), a. [< filament + -oid.] Like a filament.

filamentose (fil'a-men'tōs), a. Same as filamentous.

filamentous (fil'a-men'tus), a. [= F. filamentum = Sp. Pg. It. filamentoso; as filament + -ous.] 1. Like a thread; composed of threads or filaments.

There are several filamentous microbia which can give rise to the same appearance. Science, III. 520.

Except in Amphioxus, the branchiae are always lamellar, or filamentous, appendages of more or fewer of the visceral arches. Huxley, Anat. Vert., p. 91.

2. Capable of being drawn out into filaments, like muscus; hence, in med., containing a stringy substance; as, filamentous urine.—3. Having filaments; fringed or fringe-like; fibrillate.—Filamentous fungus, mycelium, sporophore, thallus, etc. See the nouns. Filamentous tissue, fine fibrous tissue; fibrocellular or areolar tissue.

filamentule (fil'a-men'tul), n. [*< NL. as if filamentulum, dim. of filamentum, filament.] The part of a down-feather or plume which corresponds to the barbule of an ordinary feather. [Rare.]

These filamentules have the same relation to the filament, their shaft, that the barbules of the feathers have to their barbs. Macgillivray.

filander¹ (fi-lan'dēr), n. [Early mod. E. (pl.) filander; < OF. filandre, filandre, F. filandre, a thread, string, air-thread, gossamer, in pl. filandres, filanders (> Sp. filandria = It. filandra, filanders), irreg. < F. fil, a thread, < L. filum; see fil³.] 1. The small intestinal worm which causes the disease called filanders.—2. pl. A disease in hawks, caused by small intestinal worms. Also filanders.—3. The external membrane of gut scraped off in the manufacture of catgut. Commonly as French, filandre.

This filandre is employed as thread to sew intestines and to make the cords of rackets and battledores. Enc. Diet., I. 750.

filander² (fi-lan'dēr), n. A name given by Le Erum (1711) to the short-tailed kangaroo, Macrotus asuticus or Macropus brunus. See philander.

filar (fī-lār), a. [< NL. filaris, < L. filum, a thread; see fil³.] Thread-like; filaceous or filamentous. Filar micrometer, microscope, etc. See the nouns.

Filaria (fi-lā'ri-ā), n. [NL. < filaris, < L. filum, a thread; see fil³.] The typical genus of the family Filariidae, containing parasitic nematode worms of very slender filiform shape, some attaining a length of several feet. F. sanguinis hominis, the larval form of which is found in the lymphatics and blood vessels, is said to be the cause of elephantiasis. F. melioides is the hairworm or guinea-worm, common in the tropical regions of the old world, and found in the subcutaneous tissue.

Filariadæ (fi-lā'ri-ā-dæ), n. pl. Same as Filariidae.

filarial (fi-lā'ri-āl), a. [< Filaria + -al.] Pertaining to, of the nature of, or caused by Filaria.

In the filarial disease the filarial entozoa are found in the blood of the person attacked by them, but only at certain times in the twenty-four hours.

B. W. Richardson, Prevent. Med., p. 570.

filarian (fi-lā'ri-an), a. Same as filarial.

filariate (fi-lā'ri-at), v. t.; pret. and pp. filariated, pp. filariating. [< Filaria + -ate².] To infect with Filaria.

We may settle the relation-ship of the mosquito to the Filaria . . . by filariating a man.

Manson, Trans. Linn. Soc., II. ii. 36.

filariform (fi-lar'i-fōrm), a. [< NL. Filaria + L. forma, form.] Of the form of Filaria; as, filariform nematoids.

Filariidæ (fi-lā'ri-ī-dæ), n. pl. [NL. < Filaria + -idæ.] The hairworms or guinea-worms, a family of parasitic thread-like worms, of the order Nematodea, typified by the genus Filaria. Also Filaridae. See cut under Filaria.

filate (fī-lāt), a. [< NL. filatus, thread-like, < L. filum, a thread; see fil³.] In entom., straight and without a lateral bristle or process; applied specifically to the antennæ of certain Diptera.

Filate margin, in entom., a margin separated from the disk by an impressed line running close to the edge.

filateriet, n. [ME. < OF. filaterie, philaterie, also filature, etc., < L. L. phylacterium, < Gr. φυλακτήριον, phylactery; see phylactery.] A Middle English form of phylactery. Wyclif.

filatory (fil'a-tō-ri), n. [= Pg. filatoria, < late ML. filatorium, a thread- or rope-factory, a sewing-room, < filare, wind thread, spin; see filament and fil³.] A spinning-machine.

This manufactory has three filatories, each of 400 reeds, which are moved by a water-wheel, and besides a small platory turned by men. Tucke.

filature (fil'a-tūr), n. [= F. filatura = Pg. filatura = Sp. It. filatura, < ML. filatura, the art of spinning, also a coarse thread, < filare, wind thread, spin; see fil³, v.] 1. A forming into threads; the reeling of silk from cocoons.

Floss-silk . . . is the name given to the portions of rayed silk broken off in the filature of the cocoons.

Enc. Diet., II. 461.

2. A reel for drawing off silk from cocoons; a filatory.—3. An establishment for reeling silk.

Steam filatures have become the one thing needed for success [in silk-culture]. The American, VII. 301.

Indeed, I am assured on good authority, that it is only fresh cocoons that go from the producers to the filatures, even if choked, they are accounted fresh. Science, III. 431.

filazer (fil'ā-zēr), n. Same as filacer.

filberd¹ (fīl'bērd), n. An obsolete form of filbert. filbert (fīl'bērt), n. [Formerly also written filberd, also filbeard, also (with ph) phylbert, phylbert, phyllibert; < ME. filberde, fyllberde, fylbyrde, phylbert, phyllibert. Origin uncertain, the history being obscure and involved in fable and conjecture; perhaps ult. from the name of St. Philibert.] 1. A cultivated variety of the common hazel-nut, Corylus Avellana. The Turkey filbert is the fruit of C. Colurna. See Corylus.

III bring thee

To clust'ring filberts. Shak., Tempest, II. 2.

2. The shrub which bears the nut. Also called filbert-tree.

And Demophon was so reproved
That Philis in the same throwe moment
Was shapen into a nutte-tree . . .
And after Philis phylbert
This tre was cleped in the yerd.

Gower, Conf. Amant., II. 50.

The country yielded many good trees of fruit as filberts in some places, but in all places cherie trees and a kind of pear tree meet to graffe on.

Hakluyt's Voyages, III. 122.

The filberts hanging to the ground,
The fig-tree and the maple round,
The Squire of Low Degree, l. 37 (Ritson's Metr. Rom., III).

filbert-nut¹ (fīl'bērt-nut), n. [ME. fyllberde-nutte, < fyllberde, filbert + nutte, nutte, nut.] A filbert.

Fyllberde nutte, filum.

Prompt. Par.

filbert-tree (fīl'bērt-trē), n. [Formerly also filbeard-tree; < ME. fyllberdtra, fyllberde, < fyllberde, phylbert, filbert + tra, tree.] Same as filbert, 2.

filch (fīch), v. t. [< ME. filchen, steal, of obscure origin; perhaps an assimilation of an unrecorded filcan*, felcan*, retaining the original of ME. filch, hide, conceal, as shown in leed, filch, pp. filghin, hide, intrust, commend, = Goth. filhan, hide, bury; see fil³.] To steal, especially in a small, sly way; pilfer; take from another on a petty scale, as for the supply of a present need, or in an underhand way, as by violation of trust or good faith.

In the end he gat himselfe the anger and displeasure of the masters and keepers of the said ponds and cisterns, with his continual and unmeasurable filching.

Hobland, II, of Pliny, l. 231.

But he that steals from me my good name
Robs me of that which no man can give him
And makes me poor indeed. Shak., Othello, III. 3.

He has play'd the thief with me, and filch'd away
The richest jewel of my life, my honour.
Beau. and Fl. Laws of Candy, ii. 1.
My companion manages to filch a raw onion and a crust of bread, which we share.
B. Tamer. Lands of the Saracen, p. 21.

filch' (filch), n. [< filch, v. t.] 1. A stick with a hook at the end, used in filching articles from windows, clothes-lines, etc.

When hee goes a filching, he putteth a hooke of yron, with which hee kee angles at a window, in the dead of night, for shirts, smokes, or any other linnen or woollen;
and for that reason is the statute tearmed a Filch.

De Witt. English Villaines, sig. M. 3 (ed. 1632).

2. An act of theft; also, the thing stolen.

This is all you have to do,
Save every hour a filch or two,
Be it money, cloth, or pillen.

Middleton. More Dissemblers besides Women, iv. 1.

filcher (fil'chér), n. One who filches; one who is guilty of petty theft.

For never Will I leave off the search of this bad man,
This filcher of affections, this love pedlar.
Plecher (and another). Love's Pilgrimage, iii. 1.

Every bit of brisk living, and above all when it is healthful, is just so much gained upon the wholesale filcher, death.

R. L. Stevenson. Inland Voyage, p. 124.

filchingly (fil'ching-li), adv. By pilfering; in a thievish manner.

fil'd, n. An occasional Middle English form of fil.

fil de trace (fêl dê trās), [F.: fil, thread; de,
of; trace, outline; see trace, n.] In lace-making:
(a) The outline of a pattern in needle-point lace. (b) A thread of peculiar texture differing from that of the rest of the lace and used in making such outline.

fil'dor, fil'doret, n. [ME., < OF. fil d'or, thread of gold; fil (< L. filum), thread; de (< L. de), of; or (< L. aurum), gold; see fil'd, dr'd, or dr'd.]
Gold thread.

and thickness, covered on one or more of its surfaces with teeth or transverse or oblique ridges, used for abrading, reducing, or smoothing metal, ivory, wood, or other resistant materials. See phrases below.

Time doth with his secret fil.

First and diminish each thing every while.

Saunders. Tr. of Dr. Eustace Weeks, i. 6.

2. Figuratively, any means employed to refine or polish something, as literary style.

Mock the nice touches of the critic's fil.

Alfred. Odes, ii. 1.

3. In entom., a surface covered with fine parallel ridges, on which another surface can be scraped, producing the sound called stridulation. The ridges are found on various parts of the body, as the wings, thorax, and abdomen. 1. The rough spines of a sea-urchin, as a shield. [Prov. Eng.] Balance-wheel file, a small file used by watchmakers.

Barrel-hole file, a file used by watchmakers for filing the barrel-hole and with parallel ridges.

Bastard file, bastard, blunt file, a file having a cross-cut end, and graded between a taper file and a dead-parallel file. Cabinet file, a fine single-cut file for wood-work. Cant file, see cant-file.

Checking-file, a file formed of two files riveted together to form two edges, one of which serves as a guide or spacer, while the other cuts a groove, used in check-work such as is formed on the small of gun-stocks, etc.
Also called double file. Circular file, a circular saw or serrated disk designed to run on a spindle or mandrel, used to cut the teeth of cog-wheels. Clock-pinion file, same as cutless-screw file. Cotter file, see cotter-file.

Dead file, a file whose cuts are so fine that it makes very little noise in use. Dead-parallel file, see paralled file. Dead-smooth file, a file having very fine and close teeth. Sometimes called superfine file. Dental file, a small file of varied and peculiar forms used in mechanical and operative dentistry. Double-cut file, a file which has two series of straight cuts crossing each other, and thus forming a number of points or teeth. Double file, same as checking-file. Double-half-round file, a file with curved sides and convex edges of different angles. It is used for dressing or crossing out balance-wheels, and hence is also called cross-file. Dovetail-file, a thin file with a back of tin or brass, resembling the stiffener of a dovetail- or tenon-saw. Endless-screw file, a flat file with a constant thickness and parallel edges. Also called equalizing-file. Entering-file, a flat tapering file for preparing work for a cotter or other file. Equalizing-file, a flat file with a constant thickness, more or less tapering in width. Equalizing-file, a flat file of uniform thickness, used in repairing watches and clocks. Feather-edge file, a file having a sharp edge, the cross-section forming an acute angle. Five-cant file, a file having one angle of 105 and two of 35° each, used to file M-toothed saws.

Flat file, a common double-cut file of various grades of fineness of cut, sometimes taper, and sometimes of uniform size through the whole length. Float-file, a single-cut file used by comb-makers and ivory-carvers, of several kinds, known as carlot, topper, etc. Gulleting-file, a round, blunt, single-cut file for sharpening saws. Half-round file, a file flat on one side and rounding on the other. E. H. Knight. Half-thick file, a file used as a rubber file for coarse work. It is strong and heavy, and has one round side and three flat ones. Knife-file, a file with a sharp edge and thin blade-like section, used to finish narrow grooves. Lead-float file, a coarse single-cut file for soft metals. Marble-workers' file, one of a series of fine files and rasps used by sculptors and workers in marble. One form has perforations for the escape of the dust. Middle-cut file, a file of which the teeth are in coarseness between the rough and the bastard. Nickingfile, a thin file for making nicks in the heads of screws.
E. H. Knight. Parallel file, a file of uniform section, or without taper from tang to point. A flat and mathematically correct file is termed a dead-parallel file. Perforated file, a sculptors' file which has perforations to permit the escape of abraded material. It was invented by Hiram Powers. Piercing-file, a sharp and narrow file to enlarge a narrow drilled hole. E. H. Knight. Pivot-file, a fine file used in dressing pivots on the arbors of watches. E. H. Knight. Rat-tail file, a small, round, tapering file. Rough file, a file with heavy deep cuts made at an angle of about 12° to the perpendicular.

Round-edge file, a form of file with a convex edge, used in dressing the spaces between the teeth of gear-wheels.
E. H. Knight. Round file, one of a series of small files of circular section. If tapering, such files are called rat-tail files; if of uniform section, they are called joint-files, from their use in filing out apertures for joint-wires and pintles of hinges. E. H. Knight. Round-joint file, a form of file used in clock-making. Round-off file, a small half-round file, with the convex side safe or uncut, used for rounding or pointing the teeth of wheels originally cut square. E. H. Knight. Safe-edged file, a file having one edge or more left uncut and made smooth.
Such files are most commonly used in forming a shoulder or set-off, and in filing out rectangular corners. In certain files the edges only are cut, the faces being left smooth. Saw-file, a file for sharpening saw teeth, triangular in cross-section for hand saws and flat for millsaws. E. H. Knight. Screw-head file, a feather-edged file for nicking screw heads. E. H. Knight. Second-cut file, a file graded between the bastard and smooth files. Single-cut file, any file having a single series or course of teeth; distinguished from the double-cut file.

Slitting-file, a file with two acute and two obtuse edges and parallel sides. E. H. Knight. Smooth file, a finishing file graded between the second-cut and dead-smooth files. Square file, a file which is square in its transverse section. It is usually tapering, with one smooth side.

Superfine file, same as dead-smooth file. Three-square file, the ordinary tapering hand saw file, of triangular cross-section. Also called triangular file. E. H.
Knight. To bite or gnaw a file, to attempt in anger or ignorance something that is entirely impracticable or that merely injures one's self; in allusion to the tale of the serpent which attempted to bite a file. Triangular file, same as three-square file. Verge-file, a file with one smooth side; formerly used by watchmakers when working on the verge of the old vertical escapement. E. H.
Knight. Warding-file, a flat file having a constant thickness, and cut only upon the edges; used in filing the ward notches in keys. E. H. Knight. Watch-platen file, same as warding-file.

file' (fil), v. t.; pret. and pp. filed, ppr. fil'ing. [< ME. filen = D. ripen = L.G. filu = OHG. filan, Peggs. Diary, III. 26.

2. The whole number of papers thus arranged;
hence, a collection of papers arranged according to date or subject for the sake of ready reference; also, a bundle of papers tied together with the title of each indorsed; as, a file of newspapers; a file of writs.—3. A roll, list, or catalogue.

Our present masters grow upon the file.

To five-and-twenty thousand men of choice.

Shak., 2 Hen. IV., i. 2.

You may meet,

In person of a merchant, with a soul

As resolute and free, and all ways worthy,

As else in any file of mankind.

Fletcher. Beggars' Bush, ii. 3.

4. A docket; a calendar. [Rare.]

Causes unjudg'd disgrace the loaded File;

And sleeping Laws the King's Neglect revile.

Prior. Solomon, ii.

5. A row of persons or things arranged one behind another; milit., a row of soldiers forming a line from front to rear; the number of men constituting the depth of a battalion or squadron. When a battalion is formed in two ranks, a file of soldiers means two men. The front of a file is one man; its depth may be any number of men.

So saying, on he led his radiant files,

Dazzling the moon.

Scott.

6. Regular succession of thought or narration; uniform tenor; thread of discourse.

And, were it not ill fitting for this file

To sing of hills and woods amongst warres and Knights,

I would alate the sterneesse of my stile.

Spenser. F. Q., VII. vi. 37.

Let me resume the file of my narration.

Sir H. Watton.

7. One of the lines of squares on a chess-board running directly from player to player; opposed to rank. See chess.—8. Same as rank and file.
See phrase below. [Rare.]

Philip dismissed all those of the common file, on the condition that they should not bear arms for six months against the Spaniards.

Prescott. Hist. Philip II.

9. In some parts of the United States, a cloth used in cleaning or wiping a floor. Also file-cloth.
—10. In her., same as label. Flank file, the file on the extreme right or left of any body of troops. Indian file, same as single file. On file, placed on a file, or in orderly arrangement for preservation; more specifically, in law, placed among the papers constituting the records of a court, and purporting to be there as a part of such records. Rank and file. (a) Milit., the lines of soldiers from side to side and from front to back; all common soldiers under the rank of sergeant, or sometimes all below the non-commissioned staff. Hence (b) The general body of any party or society, as distinguished from the leaders.

Single file, an arrangement of a body of persons or objects in a single line, one behind another; as, to move or march in single file. Also called Indian file, because the American Indians usually move in this order.

Middleton, Inner-Temple Masque.

3. To receive, or receive and indorse, as a document so placed.

II. intrans. To march in a file or line, as soldiers, not abreast, but one after another.

All ran down without order or ceremony, till we drew up in good order, and filed off.

Tatler.

Down to the haven of the Isle,

The monks and nuns in order file,

From Outhbert's cloisters grim.

Scott, Marmion, ii. 11.

File left (milit.), a tactical command to change the direction of a column marching in file 90° toward the left. — File right (milit.), a tactical command to change the direction of a column marching in file 90° toward the right. — To file off, in milit. tactics, to wheel off by files from marching in line and to march in file parallel to the original front, or at right angles to the first direction. To file with, to rank with; = equal to.

My endeavours

Have ever come too short of my desires,
Yet filed with my abilities.

Shaks., Hen. VIII, iii. 2.

file¹ (fil), a. and n. [< ME. file, fyle, a var. of vile; see vile. As a noun, ME. file, a wretch, a villain, a vague term of abuse. (Cf. OD. fielt, fielt, a vile, worthless, cowardly, lazy, ragged fellow. In sense 3 file seems to be popularly associated with *file*¹, as if it meant a 'hard' or 'hard-headed' person, a 'hard case.' Slang terms are unstable in meaning.) I. a. Vile.

The old emperice, the file traymour.

Otvetin (Weber's Metr. Rom.).

II. n. 1. A wretch; a villain; a vague term of abuse.

Men mithe [might] thethen [thence] a mile

fileinier, n. A Middle English form of villainy.

file-leader (fil'lè'dèr), n. Milit., a soldier placed in the front of and leading a file.

file-mark (fil'märk), n. The note indorsed by a clerk or recording officer upon a document filed, usually consisting of the word filed and the date of filing.

filemot (fil'e-mot), n. and a. [Sometimes written philomot; an accom. of F. feuille morte, of the color of a dead leaf; see feuille morte.] I. n. The color of a faded leaf; a yellowish-brown color.

The colours you ought to wish for are blue, or filemot turned up with red. Script, Directions to Servants, iii.

II. a. Of a dead-leaf color.

Labelled folios all filemot with age and use.

L. Wallace, Gen. Hist. p. 177.

filer¹ (fil'èr), n. One who files or uses a file in cutting, smoothing, or polishing.

filer² (fil'èr), n. [Cf. *file*¹, n., 2.] A pickpocket. [Slang.]

A Filer my sister, a Filer my Brother,

A Canter [tramping beggar] my Uncle

That car'd not for Felle;

A Lifter [shoplifter] my Aunt, a begger myselfe.

John Gayford, Collection of Ballads (1671).

file-shell (fil'shel), n. A bivalve mollusk of the family Pholidula, as Pholidula ductylus, the piddock; so called from the roughness of the shell.

filet (fè-lä'), n. [F., dim. of fil, a thread; see *fil*³, fillet.] In decorative art, a thin line forming part of a design or ornamenting an edge or the like; a filet; as, a filet in gold in bookbinding; a filet of ruby luster on a majolica vase. See fillet. — Filet guipure. Same as damèe lace. See lace.

filial (fil'yäl), a. [= F. filial = Pr. Sp. fil-ial = It. filiale, < LL. filialis, of a son or daughter. < filius, a son, fem. filia, a daughter; perhaps orig. (like E. son, q. v.) 'one born.' < √ fil, 'fer, bear, produce, in filus, offspring, fecundus, fruitful, femina, woman, etc.; see fitus, fecund, female, etc.] 1. Pertaining to a son or daughter; becoming to or due from a child in relation to the parents.

The Son from the Father had fatherly Love, and the Father from the Son a filial Obedience.

Bok-r. Chronicles, p. 25.

It were a sin against the piety

Of filial duty, if I should forget

The debt I owe my father.

Beau, and FL, Laws of Candy, i. 2.

With filial confidence inspired,

Can lift to Heaven an unassuming eye,

And smiling say, "My Father made them all."

Cooper, Task, v. 745.

2. Bearing the relation of a child.

Prior.

The same good office is performed by Property and its filial systems of debt and credit.

Emerson, Nature

filially (fil'yäl-i), adv. In a filial manner.

There is no servant of God but fears filially.

Bp. Hall, Holy Panegyric.

filiate (fil'i-ät), v. t.; pret. and pp. filiated, ppr. filiating. [< L. filus, a son, filia, a daughter, + *-at*²; cf. affiliate.] 1. To adopt as a son or daughter; take into filial relation.—2. In law, to determine judicially the paternity of, as a bastard child; hence, to refer to the author or maker.

Many parts indeed authenticate themselves, bearing so strong a likeness that no one can hesitate at filiating them upon the ipsissimus Luther. Southey, The Doctor, cxxxii.

3. To establish any analogous close relation between; affiliate.

Not only are the sciences as now advanced correlated by innumerable traces of consanguinity, but all the past stages of science are filiated by the same ties.

Pop. Sci. Mo., XXII. 123.

filiation (fil-i-ä'shon), n. [= F. filiation = Sp. filacion = Pg. filiação = It. filiazione; as filial + -ion.] 1. The relation of a son or daughter to a parent; the correlative of paternity.

The fathers finding great authority and energy in this confession of Peter for the establishment of the natural filiation of the Son of God.

Jer. Taylor, Works (ed. 1845), II. 352.

2. The establishment of a filial relation, specifically by adoption.

God hath forgot all these paternities, all these filiations, all these incorporations, all these invocations of Israel into his own bosom, and Israel is become the generation of his wrath.

Boane, Sermons, vi.

3. In law, the judicial determination of the paternity of a child, especially of a bastard; affiliation.

We are now sure that, if the principle on which Solomon decided a famous case of filiation were correct, there can be no doubt as to the justice of our suspicion.

Mackay, Sadler's Ref. Refuted.

4. Any analogous close connection or relation.

Two of our English letters, n and d, are derived, in strict historical filiation, from two of the alphabetic signs . . . by means of which the name of King Sent is expressed.

Isaac Taylor, The Alphabet, l. 61.

Everything tends to show that there is direct filiation between the rude workmanship of the flint of Saint Acheul and the skilled workmanship of the flint of the neolithic age.

N. Joly, Man before Metals (trans.), p. 23.

filibeg (fil'i-beg), n. [Also written fillibeg and (improp.) philibeg, sometimes filibag; < Gael. filleadh-beag, the kilt in its modern shape, lit. 'small kilt' (beag, small, little), in distinction from filleadh-mor, the 'large kilt' (mor, large, great), the kilt in its primitive form, consisting of one piece, generally of tartan, covering, when spread, the whole body, and girt around the waist; filleadh, filie, the kilt, cf. filleadh, a fold, plait, < fil, v., fold.] A plaited petticoat or skirt reaching only to the knees, worn by men in the Highlands of Scotland; a kilt.

The filibeg or lower garment is still very common.

Johnson, Jour. to Western Isles.

Upon the road to Portree, Prince Charles changed his dress, and put on man's clothes again, a tartan short coat and waistcoat, with philibeg and short hose, a plaid and wig, and bonnet.

Boswell, Journal, p. 222.

filibuster (fil'i-bus-tèr), n. [< Sp. filibustero (with inserted i in first syllable) (= It. filibustiere). < F. filibuster, earlier frabuster, a filibuster, bucanier, freebooter (with s inserted, but orig. not pronounced—a common fact in 17th century F., after the analogy of words in which an original s was retained in spelling, though it had become silent in pronunciation); < D. eribuster (Kilian, 1598), now eribuster, a freebooter = E. freebooter = Dan. frilbyter = Sw. frilbyture = G. frabouter (the E., Dan., Sw., and G. words being not independent formations, but formed after the analogy of the D. eribuster, which appears to be the oldest form). In a Dutch work ("De Americaensche Zee-Roovers," 1678) written by a bucanier named John Oexmelin, otherwise Exquemelin or Esquemeling, and translated into French and Spanish, and subsequently into English (1684), the adventurers of the West Indies are said to have been divided into three classes—the bucaniers (boucaniers) or hunters (see bucanier), the filibusters (filibusters) or rovers, and the farmers (habitans); and the filibusters are said to have assumed their name "from the English word filibuster, which means rover"; this must refer to E. freebooter, but the D. form appears to be the original. The bucaniers consisted mainly of French, Dutch, and English adventurers, and not to any extent of Spaniards, with whom they were constantly at war; the Sp. form filibustero can only be an accom. of the F. filibuster; the s is now pronounced in F., etc., because, as now used, it is taken from the books, as spelled. The commonly assumed connection with E. flyboat (Sp. flibote, flibote, F. flibot, < D. rliboot; see flyboat) has no support either in form or in historical fact.] 1. A freebooter; in history, a name distinctively applied to the West Indian bucaneeers or pirates of the seventeenth century. See buccaner. Hence—2. One of a band of men organized, in disregard of international law, for the purpose of invading and revolutionizing a foreign state. Specifically applied in history to the members of certain expeditions which in the middle of the nineteenth century originated in or set out from the United States against certain Spanish American countries for the purpose of revolutionizing them. The principal of these expeditions were those led by Narciso López from New Orleans against Cuba, in 1850-51, and those by William Walker from California against Nicaragua in 1855-58. Both leaders were captured and put to death, the latter after having succeeded in his second object and exercised sovereign power for some time over Nicaragua. Hence—3. In a legislative or other deliberative body, a member in the minority who resorts to irregular or obstructive tactics to prevent the adoption of a measure or procedure which is favored by the majority. Also filibusterer. [U. S.] filibuster (fil'i-bus-tēr), v. i. [< filibuster, n.] 1. To act as a freebooter or bucaneer.

Michigan's sweep upon Merv was not a filibustering exploit, carried off by him and other frontier officials on their own personal responsibility.

Marvin Gates of Herat, II.

2. To obstruct legislation by undue use of the technicalities of parliamentary law or privileges, as when the minority in a legislative assembly, in order to prevent the passage of some measure obnoxious to them, endeavor to consume time or fire out their opponents by useless motions, speeches, objections, etc. [U. S.]

The Democrats . . . filibustered and postponed the vote till a day when strength could be fairly measured on it.

G. S. Merriam, S. Bowles, II. 239.

They [Irish Nationalists] may, as some of the more actively bitter among them did in the Parliaments of 1874 and 1880, obstruct business by long and frequent speeches, dilatory motions, and all those devices which in America are called filibustering.

J. Bryce, in New Princeton Rev., III. 65.

filibusterer (fil'i-bus-tēr-ēr), n. Same as filibuster, 3.

filibusterism (fil'i-bus-tēr-iz-m), n. [< filibuster + -ism.] The practice of filibustering. (a) Buccaneering; freebooting.

The spirit of filibusterism must have been very active, and must have influenced large circles of the population.

H. von Holst, Const. Hist. (trans.), p. 4.

(b) Legislative obstruction. [U. S.]

filical (fil'i-ka), a. [< L. filer (filic-), fern. + -al.] Belonging to the Filices or ferns.

Filices (fil'i-sēz), n. pl. [L. pl. of filer, a fern.] The ferns, a large order of cryptogamous plants. See fern.

filiciform (fil'i-si-fōrm), a. [< L. filer (filic-), fern. + forma, shape.] Fern-shaped.

Filicinae (fil'i-sin'i-ō), n. pl. [NL. < L. as if "filicinus" < filer (filic-), fern. + -us.] A division of the vascular cryptogams especially characterized by the presence of well-developed leaves; ferns and their allies. The group is divided into leptosporangiate Filicinae, in which the sporangia are formed from a single epidermal cell, and eusporangiate Filicinae, in which they are formed from a cluster of epidermal cells, as in Urticaceae and Martaceae. The leptosporangiate Filicinae are again divided into homospores Filicinae, the true ferns, and heterospores Filicinae, comprising the Selaginaceae and Marsiliaceae, in which two kinds of spores are formed.

filicite (fil'i-sit), n. [< L. filer (filic-), fern. + -ite.] A fossil fern or filicoid plant.

filicoid (fil'i-koid), a. and n. [< L. filer (filic-), fern. + Gr. -oid, form.] 1. n. Fern-like; having the form of a fern.

II. a. A plant resembling a fern.

filicology (fil'i-kol'ō-jī), n. [< L. filer (filic-), fern. + Gr. -logia, < logō, n. speak; see -ology.] The science or study of ferns; pteridology. [Rare.]

filière (fi-har'), n. [F. < fil, a thread; see fil.] A gauge for measuring needles. See gauge.

filicity (fi-hē-ti-tē), n. [< L. filicitas, sonship, L. filius, a son; see filial.] The relation of a son to a parent; sonship. [Rare.]

The probability of A and the filicity of B are not two facts, but one, each of them expressing the same fact.

J. S. Mill, Logic, p. 1.

filiferous (fi-hf'e-rus), a. [< L. filum, a thread, + ferre, to bear; see -ous.] Producing threads, or bearing thread-like growths, as some plants, insects, mollusks, etc.; specifically, in entom., bearing very slender, thread-like organs, as the filicorns of a May fly.

filiform (fi-lī-fōrm), a. [< L. filum, a thread, + forma, shape.] 1. Like a filament in form; thready; filamentous; hairlike. 2. Pertaining to or having the characters of the Filiformia. Filiform antennae, palpi, or tarsi, in entom., those antennae, etc., in which the joints are cylindrical, slender, and closely fitted together, the outer ones being no larger than the others, so that the organ has a thread-like appearance. See cut under antennae. Filiform pulse. See pulse.

filiformed (fil'i-fōrm-d), a. Having the form or likeness of a thread or filament; filiform.

I distinctly saw a long filiformed organ, bearing excessively fine hairs in lines.

Darwin, Cirripedia, p. 9.

Filiformia (fil-i-fōr'mi-ā), n. pl. [NL., neut. pl. of filiformis, thread-like; see filiform.] In Latreille's system of classification, a division of hemodipodous crustaceans, containing the slender as distinguished from the stout hemodipods, such as Caprella, Proto, etc.; contrasted with Orelin. It corresponds to the modern family Caprellidae.

Filigera (fi-lif'e-jā), n. pl. [NL., neut. pl. of filiger; see filigerous.] A prime division of protozoans, containing the flagellate infusorians. Macrimitium Parry, 1852. Also called Phytosoida.

filigerous (fi-lif'e-rus), a. [< NL. filiger, bearing threads (i. e., flagella) < L. filum, a thread, + gerere, bear, + -ous.]. Bearing or furnished with flagella, as an infusorian; flagellate; specifically, pertaining to or having the characters of the Filigera.

Filigradae (fi-lif'grā-dē), n. pl. A suborder or superfamily of spiders, characterized by single-touted tarsi armed with but one coarse claw, proposed by Thorell (1870) for the extinct family Phalangitida or Phalangitoida.

filigrade (fil'i-grād), a. and n. [NL. < L. filum, a thread, a cobweb, + gradi, walk; see grade.] 1. a. Of or relating to the Filigradae.

II. n. A spider of the group Filigradae.

filigrain, filigraner (fil'i-grān), n. and a. [Also filigreen (now filigree, q. v.); = D. filigrane = G. Dan. filigran = Sw. filigrans, < F. filigrane, filigree (also water-mark, i. e., "wire-mark"; in this sense also written filigramme, as if connected with Gr. γράμμα, a writing, a mark), < Sp. Pg. It. filigrana, filigree, < L. filum, thread, wire, + grannum, grain; see fil and grain.] Earlier forms of filigree.

A curious filigrane handkerchief, and two fair filigrane plates brought out of Spain.

Dr. Browne, Travels (1685), p. 147.

Filigrana (fil-i-grā'nā), n. [NL. < L. filum, a thread, + grannum, a grain.] A genus of polychaetous tubicolous annelids, of the family Scrupulida. F. implexa is found on the north European coasts.

filigranet, n. and a. See filigrane.

filigree (fil'i-grē), n. and a. [Also filigrec, filigrec, filigraec; a corruption, through an earlier form "filigreen, filigreen, of the orig. form filigrain, q. v.] 1. n. Ornamental work consisting of fine gold, silver, or sometimes copper wire, formed into delicate tracery of scrolls, network, and the like, or of minute grains or plates of metal soldered to a background, or of both combined. It is used either independently or for application to more solid articles, and is one of the most ancient kinds of jewelry work. The Greek and Etruscan filigree work is of extreme beauty, and much of the jewelry for personal adornment found in their tombs or elsewhere is of this kind. In the middle ages filigree work reached great development in certain parts of Europe, especially in Ireland before the eleventh century. It is made in northern Italy, Genoa and Venice being famous for it.

Enslaves of saints and apostles set a giorno in the body of an eagle in silver filigree.

C. C. Perkins, Italian Sculpture, p. 378.

2. Any kind of ornamental openwork resembling or analogous to filigree. Hence—3. Figuratively, anything very delicate, light, and fanciful or showy in structure; especially, anything too delicately formed to be serviceable; something easily destroyed or injured.

Guarantees he said, were mere filigree, pretty to look at, but too brittle to bear the slightest pressure.

Maudslayi, Frederic the Great.

Steibelt, a maker of filigree for the piano, . . . on this occasion played in a quintet of his own with a very bad haut piano part.

Fortnightly Rev., N. S., XXVII. 281.

II. a. Composed of filigree; as, a filigree brooch.

filigreed (fil'i-grēd), a. Ornamented with filigree. [Rare.]

There was a mirror with a deep filigreed frame.

F. E. Adcock, Bad Boy, p. 37.

filigree-glass (fil'i-grē-glas), n. 1. Glass ornamented by colored threads included in the transparent mass and twisted, waved, or woven with one another so as to produce regular patterns. Compare lattice-work, vitreous train.—2. A glass vessel, especially a goblet or drinking-glass, decorated with filigree.

Two tall filigree glasses engraved with the royal rose displayed.

Jour. Archæol. Ass., XXXI. 109.

filigree-point (fil'i-grē-point), n. A kind of fancy work imitating gold lace, made by working upon a linen background with gold thread, which is afterward separated from the background. Dict. of Needlework.

filigree-work (fil'i-grē-werk), n. 1. Work in filigree; filigree.—2. Any kind of ornamentation resembling or analogous to filigree, or which is thought too minute or too fantastic for its place or purpose.

The churches of our ancestors shoot up into spires, towers, pinnacles, and filigree work.

H. Swinburne, Travels in Spain, XIV.

filig¹ (fī'ling), n. [Verbal n. of file¹, v.] 1. The act of using a file.—2. A fragment or particle rubbed off by a file; as, iron-filings.

filig² (fī'ling), n. [Verbal n. of file², v.] The act of putting upon file.

filig-board (fī'ling-bōrd), n. A board upon which a piece of work is laid or held to be filed. For certain classes of work the board is pivoted to yield to any vertical sway of the file, that it may be always flat with the surface of the file.

filiolet, n. [ME. fylgole, fylgole, < OF. fillote, fillole, fille, fiele, fyle, a column, pillar, turret.] A turret, pinnacle, or cupola.

Towre belid by twene truchet ful thik,
Fayre fylgolez that fyged, and ferly long,
With comon copounes, crafty slege.

Sir Gawayne and the Green Knight, l. 736.

Filioque (fil-i-ō'kwē), n. [L., and from the Son; filio, abl. of filius, son (see filial); que (enclitic), and.] The clause of the Nicene Creed in its western form which asserts that the Holy Ghost proceeds both from the Father and from the Son. The doctrine of the "double procession," as it is called, has been generally accepted in the Latin Church from a very early period; and this clause was frequently added to the creed before it was authoritatively incorporated in it in the eleventh century. The Greek Church, on the contrary, has always maintained the doctrine of the single procession, as expressed in the original form of the Nicene Creed, in accordance with John xv. 26, "the Spirit of truth, which proceedeth from the Father"; and the controversy on this subject (called the Filioque controversy), continued to the present time, was one of the chief causes of the schism between the two churches.

filipendula (fil-i-pen'dū-lā), n. [= F. filipendula = Sp. It. filipendula = G. filipendel, etc., < late ML. filipendula, prop. fem. of filipendulus*, hanging by a thread; see filipendulous.] The plant dropwort, Spiraea Filipendula.

filipendulous (fil-i-pen'dū-lus), a. [*< ML. filipendulus, hanging by a thread, < L. filum, thread, + pendulus, hanging, < pendere, hang; see fil and pendulous.] Suspended by a thread. [Rare.]

Filistata (fi-lis'tā-tā), n. [NL. (Walcenaer, 1805), < L. filum, thread, + status, pp. of stare, stand; see state.] The typical genus of the family Filistatidae.

Filistatidae (fil-i-stat'i-dē), n. pl. [NL. < Filistata + -idae.] A family of tubularian spiders, typified by the genus Filistata. They have two stigmata, trisi without claws, cephalic and thoracic regions continuous, mandibles united at base and the labrum united with the sternum. These spiders mostly make a tubular web in cracks and holes. Also Filistatoida.

Filitelæ (fil-i-tē-lē), n. pl. [NL. < L. filum, thread, + tela, a web; see tail.] A tribe of spiders which spread their threads about the places in which they prowl in pursuit of their prey. The most noteworthy genus is Proecto (Clotho), of Egypt and southern Europe, a limpet shaped spider, about an inch in diameter, remarkable for the curious habitation it constructs for its young.

fill (fil), v. [*Early mod. E. also fil, fille; < ME. fillen, fallen, fylten, < AS. fyltan = OS. fullian = OFries. fylla, folla = D. vullen = LG. fullen = OHG. fulljan, MHG. vullen, G. füllen = Icel. fylla = Sw. fylla = Dan. fylde = Goth. fulljan, fill, make full, < AS. full, etc., E. full; see full, a., and cf. full, v.] 1. trans. 1. To make full; put or pour something into till no more can be contained; cause to be occupied so that no space, or no available space, is left vacant; as, to fill a basket with fruit; to fill a bottle or a vessel; to fill a church; to fill a cavity in the ground or in a tooth.*

Jesus saith unto them, Fill the waterpots with water. And they filled them up to the brim.

John II. 7.

Corresponding misses fill the realm
With sentimental flippancy.

Conger, Progress of Error, l. 311.

King Arthur made new knights to fill the gap Left by the Holy Quest.

Tennyson, Pelicans and Ettaire.

2. To occupy the whole capacity or extent of; occupy so as to leave no space, or no appropriate space, vacant; permeate; pervade; as, the water fills the vessel; the company filled the house; air fills the space all around us.

The earth was filled with violence, Gen. vi. 11.

Boundless the deep, because I Am, who fill Initude; nor vacuous the space.

Milton, P. L., vii. 168.

This is the idea which belongs to body, whereby we conceive it to fill space. The idea of which filling of space is, that, where we imagine any space taken up by a solid substance, we conceive it so to possess it, that it excludes all other solid substances.

Locke, Human Understanding, II. iv. 2.

3. To satisfy or content with fullness; glut; satiate.

2d Lord. Thou art going to Lord Timon's feast.

Apem. Ay; to see meat fill knives, and wine heat fools. Shaks., T. of A., i. 1.

It makes ye Indians of these parts rich & powerful and also proud thereby; and fills them with peccers, powder, and shote, which no laws can restrain.

Bradford, Plymouth Plantation, p. 223.

4. Naut.: (a) To distend, as a sail, to its full extent by pressure, as of the wind.

A stately ship, . . .

With all her bravery on, and tackle trim, Sails fill'd, and streamers waving.

Milton, S. A., i. 718.

(b) To brace, as the yards, so that the wind will bear upon the sails and distend them.—

5. To supply with an incumbent: as, to fill an office or a vacancy.—6. To possess and perform the duties of; officiate in as an incumbent; hold or occupy: as, he fills his office acceptably; to fill the speaker's chair.

Undiscerning praise,

Where love is more attachment to the throne, Not to the man who fills it as he ought.

Cowper, Task, v. 362.

He had long filled lucrative posts.

Macaulay, Hist. Eng., vi.

7. To pour into something.

Fill me some wine.

Shaks., T. of A., iii. 1.

8. To stop up the cracks, crevices, or pores of, or hollows in; cover with a substance, as varnish, paste, or sizing, which will smooth or even the surface of, as leather, wood, canvas, or the like; specifically, to apply a varnish or paste to (wood), in order to fill the grain. See filler, 3.—9. In trade, to make up the bulk, or produce a desired appearance of, by using sham or inferior materials; adulterate; doctor; water.

Nature, XXXVIII. 297.

To fill in. (a) To place material in so as to fill up; as, to fill in an excavation or a cavity. (b) To insert so as to complete a list, an account, etc.; as, he filled in the omitted items.—To fill out. (a) To complete or make complete; extend or enlarge to the desired limit; as, to fill out a check or an engagement; to fill out a pattern or a garment with different material. (b) To pour out. [obsolete or colloq.]

Adding many prayers, that the coming of their guests might be for good, and then did fill out the wine, making a great curtesie.

Purche, Pilgrimage, p. 48.

While one filled me out very bitter tea, the other sweetened it with a vast deal of brown sugar.

Gray, Letters, I. 147.

To fill the bill, to do all that is desired, expected, or promised; suit the requirements of the case. [Slang, U. S.]—To fill time, in theatrical cant, to book dates for performances.—To fill up. (a) To make full; occupy completely or to the whole extent; complete; accomplish; as, to fill up an excavation; to fill up one's time; to fill up or fill out a blank document.

Who now rejoice in my sufferings for you, and fill up that which is behind of the afflictions of Christ in my flesh.

Col. i. 24.

It pours the bliss that fills up all the mind.

Pope, Essay on Man, iv. 341.

(b) To make complete or finished.

God sometimes bids a sinner till his wickedness is filled up. Chauncy, quoted in Bradford's Plymouth Plantation, p. 396.

II. intrans. 1. To pour a liquid into a cup or glass until it is full; hence, to give or take to drink.

"Full of the best wine," said Robin,

"This monk shall drinke to me."

Lytell Geste of Robyn Hood (Child's Ballads, V. 85). In the cup which she hath filled, fill to her double.

Rev. xviii. 6.

2. To grow or become full: as, corn fills well in a warm season; a mill-pond fills during the night.

The sails that were of taffete,

Fill'd not in the east land breeze. The Demon Lover (Child's Ballads, I. 203).

To back and fill. See back.—To fill away (unt.), to brace the yards, so that sails which have been aback will stand full.—To fill out, to become enlarged or distended.—To fill up, to grow or become full: as, the channel of the river fills up with sand every spring.

filler¹ (fil'ér), n. 1. One who or that which fills; especially, a vessel or utensil for conveying a liquid into a bottle, cask, etc.; a funnel.

Brave soldier, yield; thou' stock of arms and honour; Thou filler of the world with fame and glory.

Pletcher, Bouduca, iv. 1.

They have six diggers to four fillers, so as to keep the fillers always at work.

Martiner, Husbandry.

2. That which serves to fill up or supply a vacancy; a filling.

Horatius is such a flat epithet— as Tully would have given us in his verses. It is a mere filler, to stop a vacancy in the hexameter, and connect the preface to the work of Virgil.

Dryden, Epic Poetry.

3. In painting, a material applied to the bare wood for the purpose of filling the grain, thus making a smooth surface for the reception of the coat of paint or varnish. Fillers may be a liquid like varnish, or a paste composed of linseed-oil and any material with a tendency to force its way into the grain of the wood, as silica, powdered glass, or ground slate. They are transparent and do not mar the beauty of the wood.

4. The tobacco which makes the body of a cigar, as distinguished from the wrapper.

Cigar-makers always have an assistant (usually a girl), who prepares the fillers and wrappers for them.

U. S. Cons. Rep., No. XLV. (1886), p. 426.

(b) The ridge between the flutes of a column; a facet.—4. In her.: (a) A bearing consisting of a barrel occupying a position corresponding to the lower edge of the chief. (b) A bearing consisting of a quarter of the bordure. [Rare.]

(c) Same as bastion; in this sense usually called fillet of bastardy. Also combat.—5. In techol.:

(a) In carp.: (1) A strip nailed to a wall or partition to support a shelf, or a strip for a door to close against. (2) A strip set into an angle between two boards. (b) In golding, a band of gold-leaf on a picture-frame or elsewhere. (c) In coin-ing, a strip of metal rolled to a certain size. (d) The thread of a screw. (e) A ring on the muzzle of a gun, etc. (f) In a dairy, a perforated embly which cheese-curd are confined. (g) In book-binding, a wheel-shaped tool on the edge of which is engraved a line or decoration, which is impressed on the backs or covers of books. (h) In leg, a paper ribbon upon which telegrams are recorded. (i) In printing, a rule with broad or broad and narrow lines, principally used as a border. E. H. Knight. (j) In weaving, a strip of card-cloth.

E. H. Knight.—6. A muscle, or a piece of meat composed of muscle; especially, the fleshy part of the thigh. The fillet of beef is the tenderloin; the fillet of veal, a thick piece cut from the leg; the fillet of chicken, the breast.

Fillet of a fenny snake.

In the caudon boil and bake.

Shaks., Macbeth, iv. 1.

7. In the manege, the loins of a horse, beginning at the place where the hinder part of the saddle rests.—8. In cooking: (a) A piece of beef, veal, or chicken, etc., boned and rolled, generally larded, tied round to keep it in shape, roasted or baked, and served with various sauces. (b) A thick slice of fish.—9. In anat., some special bundle of nerve-fibers; specifically, a band of longitudinal fibers lying in the ventral and outer parts of the tegmental region of the brain. Its distribution is not completely known, but it seems to connect below with the posterior columns of the spinal cord and above with the corpora quadrigemina, optic thalamus, lenticular nucleus, and cortex cerebri. Also called lemniscus.

10. In cutom.: (a) A narrow transverse colored band or mark, or an encircling band. (b) The space between the eyes and the base of the mandibles or chelicerae, as of a spider.—Cross fillet. See cross. Tinting-fillet, a slip of wood of triangular section placed under the slates of a roof in some situations, as around chimneys, to shed water more effectually.

fillet (fil'et), v. t. [< fillut, n.] To bind, furnish, or adorn with a fillet or little band.

He made books for the pillars, and overlaid their chapters, an *fillet*ed them.

Ex. xxxviii. 28.

He holds a filleted branch, and rests on his club.

E. F. Head, Historia Numerum, p. 81.

fillet-cutter (fil'et-kut'ér), n. A gaged tool or machine for cutting fillets or strips of any material, as marble, etc.

For this operation [the cutting of the fillets, in which the fillets should all be of the same size, this regularity can only be obtained by a fillet-cutter, formed with precision.

Marble Worker, § 132.

filleting (fil'et-ing), n. 1. The material of which fillets are made.—2. Fillets collectively.—3. A kind of heavy tape. Also called stay-tape or stay-binding.

fillet-plane (fil'et-plan), n. A molding-plane adapted for dressing a square bead or fillet.

fill-horse (fil'hórs), n. [See fill.] Same as thill-horse.

Thou hast got more hair on thy chin than Dobbin my phill-horse has on his tail.

Shaks., M. of V., ii. 2.

fillbig, n. See filbig.

filling (fil'ing), n. [Verbal n. of fill, q. v.] 1. That which fills, or fills up; anything used for occupying a vacant space, completing a structure or fabric, or stopping up a hole; as, the filling of a wall, of a pie, or of a tooth.

The low panelled dado is painted in leather-toned buffs, with a narrow panel margin in broken green tint, and gilded moldings. . . . This forms a quiet base for the filling.

Beck's Jour. Dec. Art. II. 343.

Specifically—2. Carpeting of solid color, used to fill up recesses outside of bordered carpets, or to cover the whole floor where rugs are used.

—3. The woof- or weft-thread of a woven fabric.—4. (a) In needlework, any plain stitch which serves to fill considerable spaces. (b) In lace-making, the simple stitch which serves

1. A device for arresting and separating any matter mechanically suspended in a liquid. Filters used in the processes of analytical chemistry are made of paper or asbestos. The filter-paper is bibulous, consisting of nearly pure cellulose, with only bare traces of mineral matter. Many precipitates are more conveniently separated by an asbestos filter, the most common form consisting of an ordinary paper cone having the bottom perforated with fine holes which are covered with a thin asbestos felt. In the arts filters are used to purify water, syrups, vinegar, the juices of cane and fruits, oils, liquors, sewage, liquid by-products, and molten metals. The materials used in filtration are gravel, sand, charcoal, bone-black, sponge, fabrics, woven wire netting, asbestos, porous brick and stone, mineral wool, rope, paper, and powdered glass. The devices used to hold the straining material are in a great variety of forms, from a simple wick or loose cloth hung over the edge of a bowl of water and acting as a capillary strainer, to a settling pond filtering 400,000 gallons of water in a day. The most common filter is a cone of bibulous paper, or a square of cloth sewed together to form a bag (called Hippocrates' sleeve). Filters also consist of porous brick or stone partitions, as in a cistern, or vessels partly filled with sand and gravel, or tubes filled with sponge, charcoal, or sand, etc. Domestic filters are used in connection with pumps and water-faucets. To cause the liquid to pass through a filter, the weight of a column of water, the pressure of the atmosphere, mechanical force from a screw or from steam-pressure, and centrifugal force are employed, as in the centrifugal filter, oil-filter, vacuum-filter, and many forms of pressure-filters. Filters are also made reversible and intermittent, so that the filtering material may be freed from the collected sediment. In some pressure-filters the liquid or syrup is within a cylinder, and is forced outward through rings of fabric under steam-pressure; in others it is forced through a series of strainers piled one above another. Where bone-black and charcoal are used, there is also a filtering or straining of a certain amount of gas and organic material that would pass through any other filter without detention. Filters are also used to remove dust and floating matter from air, but such devices are more properly termed air-strainers.

Having for trial sake filtered it through cap-paper, there remained in the filter a powder of a very deep and lovely colour. Boyle, Works, I. 365.

Specifically — 2. In fish-culture, a long box in which screens, usually of dannel, are placed, through which the water is filtered before it passes into the hatching-troughs. Also called filtering-box, filtering-tank. Aerating filter. See aerate. — Capillary filter. See capillary. — Centrifugal filter. See centrifugal. — Reversible filter, a filter so arranged that the fluid may flow through it in either direction; a self-clearing filter. E. H. Knight.

filter¹ (fil'tér), v. [= D. filtreren = G. filtrieren = Dan. filtrere = Sw. filtrera, < F. filtrer, OF. filtrer, earlier foutrer, = Sp. Pg. filtrar = It. filtrare, < ML. filtrare, strain through felt, etc., < filtrum, feltum, felt, a filter: see the noun.] I. trans. 1. To purify or defecate, as water or other liquid, by passing it through a filter or any cleansing medium; strain.

Sages after sages strove
In vain to filter off a crystal draught
Pure from the lees. Comper, Task, II. 508.

Specifically — 2. In analyt. chem., to separate (a solution) from the solid matter contained in it, either for the purpose of collecting and saving the solid matter, usually a precipitate, or of preparing the solution for further operations.

II. intrans. To percolate; pass through or as through a filter.

The huge black houses, between their almost meeting corners, suffer a meagre light to filter down over rough-hewn stone. H. James, Jr., Trans. Sketches, p. 258.

Swedenborg's thought has been slowly filtering into philosophy and theology, spiritualizing both.

J. F. Clarke, Self-Culture, p. 77.

filter², v. t. Same as felter.

filter³, n. See philter.

filter-bed (fil'tér-bed), n. A pond or tank having a false bottom covered with sand, and serving to filter river- or pond-waters.

filter-faucet (fil'tér-fá set), n. A faucet having a small filter affixed to its spout.

filtering (fil'tér-ing), n. [Verbal n. of *filter*¹, v.] Straining; defecating; used in compounds. — Filtering-bag, a conical bag made of close flannel, and kept open at the top by means of a hoop. It is used in filtering wine, vinegar, etc. — Filtering-box, same as *filter*². — Filtering-cup, a pneumatic apparatus used for the purpose of showing that if the pressure of the atmosphere be removed from an under surface by exhaustion with an air-pump, the pressure on the surface above will force a fluid through the pores of substances which it could not otherwise penetrate. — Filtering-funnel, a glass or other funnel made with slight flutes or channels down the lower parts of the sides. When used it is lined with filtering-paper, folded and loosely put in. The channels allow the liquid to ooze more freely than in a smooth funnel. — Filtering-paper, any paper mixed and sufficiently porous to allow liquids to pass through it. — Filtering-press, a filter in which the liquid is forced through the strainers by atmospheric or mechanical pressure or by the weight of a column of water; a filter-press. — Filtering-stone, any porous stone, such as sandstone, through which water is filtered. — Filtering-tank. Same as *filter*¹, 2.

filter-paper (fil'tér-pá pèr), n. Porous paper designed to be used for filtering.

filter-press (fil'tér-pres), n. 1. A filtering-press. Specifically — 2. An apparatus for the extraction of oil from fish, as menhaden, and the compression of the residuum into cakes.

filter-pump (fil'tér-pump), n. An arrangement devised by the German chemist Bunsen, and much used by chemists to accelerate the filtering process. The atmospheric pressure is diminished in the vessel into which the filtered liquid passes by the aspirating effect of a stream of water flowing through a connecting tube, and the full atmospheric pressure on the surface of the liquid in the funnel forces the liquid through the pores of the filter-paper or other material.

filth (filth), n. [< ME. filthe, filthe, falthre, < AS. filtha (= OS. filtha = D. vuile = OHG. fulida), filth, foulness, < ful, foul, + formative -th: see foul and *fil*².] 1. Anything that soils or defiles; foul, offensive matter; also, the state of being defiled; a foul condition; squalor; nastiness.

All our hole is but filth. York Plays, p. 5.

As false and foul
As the pouch of filth that floods the middle street.
Tennyson, Merlin and Vivien.

2. Anything that sullies or befouls the moral character; pollution; defilement.

When we in our viciousness grow hard,
In our own filth, the wise gods seal our eyes.
Shak., A. and C., III. 11.

Purifying our souls from the dross and filth of sensual delights. Tillotson, Sermons.

3. Figuratively, a low or foul fellow; a wretch.

Then was Meliora neig and al most for fore,
Best that foule filthe should have hem fouled there.
William of Palerne (E. E. T. S.), I. 2542.

Filth, thou best. Shak., Othello, v. 2.

= Syn. 2. Impurity, grossness, obscenity.

filth-disease (filth'di-zé-z), n. A disease caused by or arising in consequence of filth.

Typhoid fever and other preventable filth diseases.
Science, VI. 101.

filthhead¹, n. [ME. filthched; < filth + -head.] Filthiness; foulness.

Lo, I come as a night thief, blessed is he that waketh and kepeth hise clothis that he wandre not naked, and that thei se not the filthhead of him. Wycht, Rev. xvi. 15.

filthy (fil'thi), adv. In a filthy manner; foully; offensively.

If she do not paint, she will look so filthy thou canst not love her!
Barbon, Anat. of Mel., p. 572.

filthiness (fil'thi-nés), n. 1. The state of being filthy, polluted, or defiled.

Who seeth not the filthiness of eul wanteth a great foile to perceive the beauty of vertue.

Sir P. Sidney, Apol. for Poetrie.

Let us cleanse ourselves from all filthiness of the flesh and spirit. 2 Cor. vii. 1.

2. That which is filthy; filth; squalor; pollution; corruption.

Carry forth the filthiness out of the holy place.
2 Chron. xxiv. 5.

= Syn. See filth.
filthless¹, n. [ME. filthless; < filth + -less.] Undefiled.

Fountain of filthless, as birch current cleve.

Common relation of our Lady, I. 51.

filthy (fil'thi), n. [< filth + -y.] 1. Containing or involved in filth; foul; dirty; noisome; nasty.

Fair is foul, and foul is fair;
Hover through the fog and filthy air.

Shak., Macbeth, i. 1.

The filth by lane rings to the yell of the trampled wife.
Tennyson, Maud, i.

The environs of the camp were in a filthy state, the Russians neglecting the most simple sanitary precautions.
Edgewood, Merv, iv.

2. Morally foul; defiled by sinful practices; polluted.

He which is filthy, let him be filthy still. Rev. xiii. 11.

The rank debauch suits Chodio's filthy taste.

Comper, Progress of Error, I. 188.

To abound, if I please at any moment, in all manner of profane, injurious, and filthy behavior.

H. James, Subs. and Shad., p. 84.

3. Low; scurvy; contemptible; mean.

He wrought better that made the painter; and yet he's but a filthy piece of work.

Shak., T. of A., i. 1.

Hab. Here is the cap your worship did bespeak.

Pet. . . . This low and filthy.

Why, tis a cockle, or a walnut-shell.

A knack, a toy, a trick. Shak., T. of the S., iv. 3.

filtrate (fil'trát), v. t.; pret. and pp. filtrated, ppr. filtrating. [< ML. filtratus, pp. of filtrare, filter: see *filter*¹, v.] To filter; defecate, as liquor, by straining or percolation; also used figuratively.

From hence it appears that the expressed juices of vegetables, not filtered very clear, contain then whole spiteful virtues. Arbuthnot, Aliments, iii.

To believers . . . it must be even more evident than to unbelievers that a Christianity filtered of all its "sectarian" dogmas is a Christianity so enlightened as to be able to dispense with Christ.

H. N. Grecham, Short Studies, p. 331.

filtrate (fil'trát), n. [< NL. filtratum, neut. of filtratus, pp. of filtrare, filtrate: see filtrate, v.] The liquid which has been passed through a filter.

filtration (fil-trá-shon), n. [= F. filtration = Sp. filtracion = Pg. filtração = It. filtrazione, < ML. as if filtratio(n)-*, < filtrare, filter: see *filter*¹, v.] The act or process of filtering; the process of mechanically separating and removing the undissolved particles floating in a liquid, as by passing the liquid through filtering-paper, charcoal, sand, etc. See *filter*¹.

The nature of suction, the cause of filtration, and the rising of water in siphons. Chauville, Essays, iii.

The process of upward filtration through sand is inefficient for the purification of sewage from soluble offensive matters. E. Frankland, Expts. in Chem., p. 750.

filum (fí'lum), n.; pl. fila (fí-lá). [L., a thread: see *file*³.] 1. A thread; a filament, fibril, or fine fiber; a filar structure. — 2. In musical notation, the stem or tail of a note. Fila spermatica, spermathe threads; spermatozoa. Kolbke. Filum terminale, the terminal thread of the spinal cord, the continuation of the spinal cord, greatly diminished in caliber, after the giving off of the great trunks of lumbar and sacral nerves known as the cauda equina.

finishing (fin'á-shing), n. [With accom. term., ult. < OF. finis, dung (cf. finur, F. finur, dunghill), < L. finis, dung: see finits, finits.] Among hunters, the dung of several sorts of wild beasts; funnels. E. Phillips, 1706.

fimble¹ (fim'b'l), v.; pret. and pp. fimbled, ppr. fimbler. [A dial. var. of fumble: see fumble, and cf. *fumble*².] I. intrans. To fumble; do anything imperfectly or irresolutely. Hallwell; Forby. [Prov. Eng.]

II. trans. To touch something lightly. Wright.

fimble² (fim'b'l), n. [< MD. finel, "cannabis brevior," i. e., the smaller sort of hemp, male hemp, teased hemp or flax, < finchen, tease-flax, hemp, or wool (D. finchen, card), prob. the same word as finchen, finchen, finchen, move quickly, move the fingers quickly, play, trifle, etc., = E. *fimble*¹, v. Hence G. finmel, also finmel, finel, finmel-hemp, finmel, pick-fimble-hemp; F. dial. finmel, pick-fimble-hemp, finmel, finmel-hemp.] The larger sort of hemp is really female, but is popularly regarded as male, and hence called carl-hemp, q. v.; hence the name fimble for the smaller sort has been regarded as a corruption of female and explained accordingly.] The male plants of hemp, which, being soonest ripe, are picked out by hand from among the female, which are left to ripen their seed.

The first season for pulling the hemp is usually about the middle of August, when they begin to pull what they call the fimble hemp, which is the male hemp.

Miller, Gardener's Dict.

fimbria (fim'bri-á), n.; pl. fimbriae (fím-bri-á). [< Pg. It. fimbria, < L. fimbria, sing. a border, L. fimbria, pl., fringe, fibrous part, threads, prob. a nasalized deriv. of fibra, a thread, fiber: see *fiber*¹.] 1. In zool. and bot., one of the parts or processes which collectively make a fringe; a fringing filament, fibril, or filum. — 2. pl. A set of fringing processes; a fringe. Specifically: (a) In anat.: (1) The fringed extremity of a Fallopian tube. (2) A narrow band of white fibers running along the median concave side of the hippocampus major. It is a continuation of the pillars of the fornix. Also called brachia hippocampi and corpus fimbriatum. (b) In cat., an irregular fringe of hairs on any margin or on the abdomen, specifically, the ciliated hairs on the end of the abdomen, seen in Asterina and other bryozoa. (c) In bot., a dissected, fringe-like border; in mosses, the peristome.

3. [cap.] [NL.] A genus of mollusks.

fimbrial (fim'bri-ál), n. [< fimbria + -al.] 1. Of or pertaining to a fimbria. — 2. Of or pertaining to the fimbriae of the brain. Fimbrial fissure, in anat., a distinct and apparently constant depressed line between the fascicula and the fimbria, thus coinciding with the margin of the cuneus. It is not a true cortical fissure. Wilder and Gray.

Fimbriaria (fim-bri-á'-ri-á), n. [NL., < L. fimbria, pl., fringe: see fimbria.] A genus of Hepatica, related to Marchantia, and differing in having the inner involucre split into from 8 to 16 pendent linear divisions.

fimbriate (fim'bri-át), a. [= It. fimbriato, fringed, < L. fimbriatus, fibrous, fringed, < fim- brat, fringe: see fimbria.] 1. In zool. and bot., fringed; bordered with hairs or with filiform processes or laciniations. Also fimbriated.—2. In her., same as fimbriated. 2. Fimbriate antennæ, antennæ having a fringe of hairs on one or both sides.

fimbriate (fīm'brī-āt, v. t.; pret. and pp. fimbriated, ppr. fimbriating. [< L. fimbriatus, pp.; see fimbriate, a.]) To finish or decorate with a border of any kind, as a fringe, a hem, or a narrow stripe of different color from the rest of the surface.

—fimbriate the liver (in king or dressing official's robes), as piercing, voiding, præcunctus, &c., inasmuch that crosses alone, as they are variously disposed, is enough to distinguish all the several families of gentlemen in England.

Fuller, Holy War, p. 271.

fimbriated (fīm'brī-āt-ed), p. a. 1. Fringed. Sp. et. ally.—(a) In zool. and bot., same as fimbriate. 1. (b) In her., an epithet applied to many of the murice or whelks having thin, elevated, fin-like processes on their shells, and to some cyclostomous land-shells which have like processes round the aperture. (c) In ornth., applied to the toes of birds which have marginal fringes or lobes, as those of the coot, grebe, and phalarope, or a series of small horny processes, as those of grouse. (d) In anat., applied (1) to the fringed extremity of the Fallopian tube, or oviduct of Mammalia, especially of the human female; (2) to the fimbriae of the brain.

2. In her.: (a) Bordered or edged with a narrow band on all sides. Thus, a bend fimbriated or has the narrow gold edge at each end and running along the outline of the escutcheon as well as along the sides of the bend. (b) Less properly, edged along one side only, as the St. Patrick's saltire in the British union jack. Also fimbriate and edged.

The Union Flag shall be Azure, the Crosses Saltire of St. Andrew and St. Patrick quarterly per Saltire, counter-charged, argent and gules, the latter fimbriated of the second, surmounted by the Cross of St. George of the third, fimbriated as the Saltire.

Quoted in N. and Q., 7th ser., IV, 485.

Fesse fimbriated. See fesse.

fimbriation (fīm'brī-ā-shən), n. [< fimbriate + -ion.] 1. The state or quality of being fimbriated; that which is fimbriated: a fringe or fringing. Specifically—2. In her., a narrow edge or stripe following the outline of a bearing. See fimbriated, 2.—3. A fringe-like part; a single division or lobe of a fringe.

Fimbribranchia (fīm'brī-brang'ki-ā), n. pl. [NL., < L. fimbria, pl. fringe, + Gr. ἄνθη, anthe, gills.]. In Hogg's system of Amphibia, the second tribe of the third order (Mouthbranchia), characterized by fringed gills, and thus differing from the Rambranchia or Sacridæ and Probranchia; proposed for the Amphibichthyidae or Leptobranchiidae, now recognized as fishes.

Fimbribranchiata (fīm'brī-brang'ki-ā'tā), n. pl. [NL., see fimbribranchiate.] A primary group of paguriform anomalous crustaceans characterized by phyllobranchiate gills, thus distinguished from the other types which are trichobranchiate. It is represented only by the family Parapaguridae.

fimbribranchiate (fīm'brī-brang'ki-āt), a. [As Fimbribranchia + -ate.] Of or relating to the Fimbribranchiata.

fimbriate (fīm'brī-kāt), a. An erroneous form of fimbriate.

fimbrella (fīm'brī-llā), n.; pl. fimbrellæ (-ē). [NL., dim. of L. fimbria, pl. fimbriae, a fringe.]. A single division or tooth of a minute fringe.

fimbrellate (fīm'brī-llāt), a. [< fimbrella + -ate.] Bordered with fimbrellæ or a small fringe.

fimbrelliferous (fīm'brī-llī'fēr-ūs), a. [< L. as if fimbrella, dim. of fimbria, pl. fimbriae, a fringe, + fērre = f., bear.]. In bot., bearing fimbrellæ; as the receptacle of some composites.

fimetarius (fīm-ē-tā'ri-ūs), a. [< L. fimetum, dungfall, < fimer, dung; see fimer.] In bot., growing on or amidst dung.

fin (fīn), n. [< ME. fin, fimen, < AS. finn = MD. fin, D. fin, fīn, fīn, fīn (< G. fīn) = OS. fin, Sw. fin, fēn, fēn. Dan. fin, fin, = L. finis, fin. L. finis, a fin, is rare; it is usually recorded as identical with pinus or pinus (and different word), but used indiscriminately, and often where a feather on an arrow, an arrow, fish, pinus, a pin, etc. The form pinus is in OH. fin, fin, fin, the same, though with different suffix. a. L. finis, q. v. See pinus.] and pin.] 1. An extension from the body of an aquatic animal, which serves for propelling, steering, or balancing in the water, and is developed from various parts of the body, generally as an alate or wing-like organ; a pinna. (a) In fishes there are unpaired or vertical and paired or horizontal fins. The former are dorsal, anal, or caudal. The paired fins are pectoral and ventral, the former homologous with the anterior member or manus (hand) of terrestrial vertebrates, the latter homologous with the posterior member or pes (foot). The relations of the spinous and soft portions of the dorsal and anal fins, and the position and structure of the ventral fins, as well as various other modifications of all the fins, have been much utilized for the classification and discrimination of groups in ichthyology. The names of the fins are commonly abbreviated A., C., D., P., V., as in the accompanying figure. In the lower fishes the fins are sustained in an erect position by numerous filamentary or slender rods (actinotrichia), but in the typical fishes there is a growing together of the actinotrichia into special rays or spines. In various forms (Acantopterygii, Salmoidæ, etc.) there is likewise a pocket-like sac or ridge on the hinder part of the back, generally consisting of adipose matter and called an adipose fin. (b) In cetaceans and sirenians the caudal (and if present) the dorsal fins are simply extensions of integument and soft tissues without any skeletal framework, while the pectorals are homologous with the anterior limbs of quadrupeds, having the same bones concealed in the outgrown integument; but there are no outward indications of hind limbs as fins. (c) In seals and other aquatic carnivorous mammals the fore and hind limbs, more or less involved in the common integument, constitute fins or flippers. (d) In various aquatic reptiles there are fins like those of cetaceans, being either tegumentous expansions or pectoral limbs, or both; and pelvic limbs are also often present in the form of fins. (e) In aquatic batrachians, adult or larval, the tail is usually a fin, as that of the tadpole. (f) In birds the reduced and peculiarly modified wings of penguins constitute fins. (g) In numberless invertebrates some extended or expanded part or organ of the body, of no determinate homology, serves as a swimming-organ, and so constitutes a fin, as the expansion of the foot of a pteropod. See pinna, flipper.

Altitrativ Finis (ed. Morris), li. 531.

The bright-eyed perch with fins of Tyrian dye.

Pope, Windsor Forest, l. 142.

The pectorals or side fins of a whale are called pin, in contradistinction to the flukes, or caudal fin.

C. M. Seemann, Marine Mammals, p. 310, Glossary.

The principal organ of motion [in fishes] is the tail; the dorsal and ventral fins apparently serve to balance the fish, and the pectorals to arrest its progress when required.

Eng. Cyclopaedia.

2. In sporting, a general term for fish, as in the phrase "fin, fur, and feather."—3. Something resembling a fin. (a) A fin-like organ or attachment, or one appearing or used like a fin; in slang language, the hand.

The fin of her eyelids look most teeming blue.

Webster, Duchess of Malfi, ii. 1.

(b) The sharp plate in the collar of a plow. (c) In molding, a thin projection on the surface of a casting, caused by the imperfect approximation of two molding-boxes, containing each a part of the mold. The fin is formed by the metal running in between the two parting surfaces. (d) In con., a blade of whalebone. (e) A slip inserted longitudinally into a shaft or arbor, and left projecting so as to form a guide for an object which may slip upon it, but not rotate. E. H. Knight. (f) A tongue on the edge of a board. E. H. Knight. (g) Abdominal, adipose, anal, caudal, dorsal, lateral, pectoral, ventral, vertical, etc. fin. See the adjectives, and det. 1. Fin of the eye, the eyelid.

Ride at the ring till the fin of his eyes looks as blue as the welkin.

Marsden and Webster, Malcontent, i. 3.

finable (fī'nā-bl), a. [< fin, v., + -able.] Subject to a fine or penalty; as, a finable offense; persons are finable for certain acts.

And if he then confess the truth, and ad that he shall be exonerated of and knoweth in that behalf; that then the one offences of hunting by him done be against the king but trespass finable.

R. 100, Statute, fol. 170, Stat. of Hen. VII, vii.

It finnyen, after sworn, eat and drink, . . . they are finable.

Poulton, Law Dict.

finable (fī'nā-bl), a. [< fin, v., + -able.] Capable of being refined, clarified, or purified.

finably, adv. [ME., also finably; < fin, v. + -able + -ly. Cf. finally.] At the end; finally.

Than they sent out spies to seke hym & finably he was founde in his owne cyt called Aramathi.

Joseph of Arimathea (E. E. T. S.), p. 28.

final (fī'nāl), a. and n. [< ME. final, < OF. final, F. final = Pr. Sp. final = It. finale, < L. finalis, of or relating to the end or to boundaries, < L. finis, end; see fin.] I. a. 1. Pertaining to the end or conclusion; ultimate; conclusive; last; as, the final issue or event of things; a final effort.

There be many examples where sea-fights have been final to the war.

Bacon, Kingdoms and Estates.

Oh, yet we trust that somehow good

Will be the final goal of ill.

Tennyson, In Memoriam, liv.

The final touch was given to the cupola at the intersection of nave and transept.

C. E. Norton, Church-building in Middle Ages, p. 125.

2. Respecting the end or object to be gained; having regard to the purpose or ultimate end in view. See cause, I.

We nobly take the high priori road,

And reason downward, till we doubt of God; . . .

Or, at one bound, overleaping all his laws.

Make God man's image, man the final cause.

Pope, Dunciad, iv, 478.

Thus we necessarily include, in our idea of organization, the notion of an end, a purpose, a design; or, to use another phrase, a final cause.

Whewell.

3. In law: (a) Precluding further controversy on the questions passed upon: as, a statute declaring that the decision of a specified court shall be final.

The scripture only can be the final judge or rule in matters of religion.

Milton, Civil Power.

(b) Precluding further controversy on the questions passed upon, except by way of appeal: as, a final accounting by an executor or administrator—that is, an account which has been adjudicated after hearing, or opportunity for objections, as distinguished from a voluntary or unadjudicated account. (c) Determining completely the rights of the parties, so that no further decision upon the merits of the issues is necessary: as, a final judgment or decree—that is, one that is ready for execution, or for review by an appellate court, as distinguished from an interlocutory judgment or decree, or one that is preliminary to a further hearing and decision on details, before its execution or review by appeal. Final close, in music, a concluding cadence. Final diameter. See tactical diameter, under diameter.

For final, finally. Chaucer. = Syn. Final, Eventual, Ultimate, Conclusive. Final, coming at the end or at last, marks mainly the circumstance of being the last or at the last. Eventual has reference rather more to the outcome of events. Ultimate is like eventual in that respect; an ultimate object is that to which all one's actions tend as their aim and crowning point; in this sense it is a sort of superlative, with ultimate as the corresponding comparative. Conclusive, like decisive, is active; it means final by closing or settling, putting a stop to any further question or procedure; as, a conclusive argument, step, decision.

Yet despair not of his final pardon.

Milton, S. A., l. 1171.

The superficial observer . . . may regard the multiplication of States, with their different local interests, as an alarming source of dissension, threatening eventual destruction in the republic.

Everett, Orations, I, 199.

Many actions apt to procure fame are not conducive to this our ultimate happiness.

Addison.

This objection . . . will not be found by any means so . . . conclusive as at first sight it seems.

Hobbes, Life, p. 27.

II. n. That which is last; that which forms an end or termination; specifically, in Gregorian music, the tone in each mode with which melodies must end; in authentic modes the lowest tone, and in plagal modes the fourth tone from the bottom. The final corresponds in part to the modern key-note or tonic.

The intervals of each "mode" are derived from a fundamental sound, called its final.

Engel, Brit., XIX, 169.

finale (fī'nā'le), n. [It., < finale, n., final, last, < L. finalis; see fin.] 1. In music: (a) The concluding section of a piece in rondo form, or of an act of a dramatic work, like an opera, especially if so managed as to produce an impressive climax. Operatic finales are usually concerted pieces for several soloists and a chorus.

In the finale to Mozart's so-called Jupiter Symphony every conceivable contrapuntal resource is employed.

Grove, Dict. Music, I, 523.

(b) The last piece on a program, as of a concert.—2. The last part, piece, or scene in any public performance or exhibition; any concluding act or performance.

It was arranged that the two horsemen should first occupy the arena, . . . that Glaucon and the lion should next perform their part in the bloody spectacle, and the tiger and the Nazarene be the grand finale.

Kultur, Last Days of Pompeii, v. 2.

finality (fī-nal'ī-tī), n. [< L. finalitas (fī-nal'ī-tis), the being last, < L. finalis, last: see final.] 1. The quality or state of being final; the state of being settled or finally arranged; completion; conclusion.

Now, fellow-citizens, I view the finality of the Compromise as necessary to the peace and preservation of the Union.

J. Buchanan, in Curtis, II, 65.

Impatient of finality, we make each goal, when reached, a starting-point for further quest.

G. H. Lewes, Probs. of Life and Mind, I, 26.

It is a grave question whether in one act at least finality has not been achieved. Fortnightly Rev., N. S., XI, 369.

2. In philos., the doctrine that nothing exists or was made except for a determinate end; the doctrine of final causes.

But the very best explanation is imperfect if we refuse to restrict ourselves within the limits of scientific finality, and demand a cause of the cause, an origin of the origin.

G. H. Lewes, Probs. of Life and Mind, II, n. § 5.

3. That which is final or last; a final act or result; an absolute conclusion or determination: as, to reach a finality in a negotiation; this offer is a finality.

finally (fī-nal'ī), adv. [< ME. fynally; < final + -ly.] 1. At the end or conclusion; ultimately; at last; lastly: as, he finally submitted.

Finally they accorded to Melchior, that Guyot had put in Prison at Montreville.

Manderly, Travels, p. 38.

Finally, brethren, farewell.

2 Cor. xiii, 11.

Lastly and finally, mine host of the Garter.

Shaks., M. W. of W., I, 1.

His [Clive's] first attachments . . . were to Mr. Fox; at a later period he was attracted by the genius . . . of Mr. Pitt; but finally he connected himself in the closest manner with George Grenville.

Macaulay, Lord Clive.

2. Completely; beyond recovery.

What games that would give to the gear harness,

To affirm hit as fast, finally for ever.

Destruction of Troy (E. E. T. S.), I, 11470.

The enemy was finally exterminated.

Sir J. Davies.

3*t.* In old Eng. law, a judicial proceeding, often fictitious, resorted to merely as a mode of conveyance of land. The persons concerned in the transfer were made parties to a fictitious action, in which the transferee solemnly acknowledged the land to be the property of the transferee, thus by apparent compromise putting an end to the suit. It was used very commonly as a means of putting an end to an entail.

This fellow might be in 's time a great buyer of land, with his statutes, his recognizances, his *fin*es, his double vouchers, his recoveries.

Shak., Hamlet, v, 1.

Fines were a very ancient class of conveyances by matter of record, consisting of fictitious suits in the Court of Common Pleas, commenced and then compromised by leave of the Court. They were called *fin*es because they put an end not only to the pretended suit, but also to all claims not made within a certain time.

N. and Q., 7th ser., I, 13.

4. In feudal law: (a) A final agreement between persons concerning lands or rents, or between the lord and his vassal prescribing the conditions on which the latter should hold his lands. [Rare.] (b) A sum of money paid by custom by a tenant to his lord, nominally as a gratuity, and distinct from rent. This custom belongs solely to feudal tenures and to those modified by the feudal law, as copyholds. Fines were paid usually at a transfer of the tenant's estate by alienation or succession, but sometimes on other occasions, as at the death of the lord.

A knave; a rascal; an eater of broken meats; a base, proud, shallow, beggarly, three-suited, hundred pound, filthy, worsted-stocking knave; a lily-livered, action-taking, whorson, glass-gazing, superserviceable, finical rogue; one-trunk inheriting slave.
Shak., Lear, ii. 2.

You are too finical for me; speak plain, sir.
B. Jonson, Tale of a Tub, iv. 1.

The king also reprobated the finical embarrassments of the new fashions, and seldom wore new clothes.
L. D'Israeli, Lit. Char., p. 573.

—Syn. Finical, Spence, Foppish. Finical applies to an overwrought delicacy of taste in manners, dress, and speech; spence, to appearance, especially dress, a spence person being too conspicuously trim for elegance or dignity; foppish, to absorption in the vanities of dress. All these words are applied especially to men. See coarctate.

Be not too finical; but yet be clean;
And wear well-fashion'd clothes, like other men.
Dryden, tr. of Ovid's Art of Love, l. 578.

Gowns at length are found more masquerade,
The tassell'd cap and the spence band a jest,
A mockery of the world!
Cowper, Task, ii. 749.

Foppish airs
And histrionic mimicry, that let down
The pulpit to the level of the stage.
Cowper, Task, ii. 562.

finality (fin-i-kal'i-ti), n. [Final + -ity.] 1. The state or quality of being final; finalness.—2. Something of a final nature; as, that is a mere finality. Prescott.

finify (fin'i-fi), v. t. [< finic, U. S., + -ify, make.] To make fine; adorn. [Obsolete or colloquial.]

As nimble a fine fellow of his feet as his hands; for there is a noble courtier, his companion, both . . . pared and finified them. B. Jonson, Pam's Anniversary.

All the morning he wasteth in finifying his body to please her eye. Man in the Moon, 1690.

finikin (fin'i-kin), a. and n. [Also finuikin and, with accom. terminations, finicking, finicky, finical; orig. a dial. word, of D. origin; cf. MD. finikens, adv., precisely, exactly, neatly, < fin, fine, precise, exact, + dim. -ken, E. -kin.] I. a.

1. Daintily fine; dainty.
With that came in a wealthy knight,
Which was both grave and odd,
And after him a finikin lass,
Did shine like the glistering gold.
Robin Hood and Allan A Dale (Child's Ballads, V, 284).

2. Pettily particular; precise in trifles; idly busy; especially, particular about dress.

The bearded creatures are quite as finikin over their toilets as any coquette in the world. Chatsworth.

The most finikin of us must needs begrime himself in getting forward ever so little a distance.

Contemporary Rev., LIV, 33.

II. n. A sort of pigeon with a crest somewhat resembling the mane of a horse.

fining (fī'ning), n. [Verbal n. of finic, c.] 1.

(a) The process of refining or purifying. (b) The process of clarifying wine or other liquor by hastening the deposition of floating solid matters.

Both white of egg and gelatine . . . are freely used for fining, and . . . wines that have been freely subjected to such fining keep better and become dryer with age. Pop. Sci. Mo., XXVI, 672.

2. The process of becoming clear; said especially of wine and other liquors.—3. The material or mixture introduced into liquor to clarify it, as whites of eggs or alum. It is customary to mix the fining with a little of the liquor and beat them thoroughly together; the mixture is then poured into the cask and the liquor is stirred.

fining-forge (fī'ning-fōrj), n. A finery or reheating furnace.

fining-pot (fī'ning-pot), n. A vessel in which metals are refined.

The fining pot is for silver, and the furnace for gold. Prov., xvii, 3.

fining-roller (fī'ning-rō lēr), n. In a paper-making machine, a cylindrical sieve of wire cloth by which the coarse fibers and knots are retained while the finely ground stuff is permitted to pass through.

finis (fī'nis), n. [L., the end, limit; see finic, finish.] The end; conclusion; a word occasionally, and in former times commonly, placed at the end of a book.

finish (fin'ish), v. [< ME. finischen, finisshen, also in contr. form finchen (like punchen, contr. of puisshen; see punch = puish), < OE. fi- niss, stem of certain parts of finir, F. finir = Pr. finir = OSp. finir = It. finire, < L. finire, end, finish, complete, < finis, limit, end; see finic, n. and v.] I. trans. 1. To bring to an end; arrive at the end of; complete by passing throughout the length or extent of: as, to finish a journey or an undertaking; to finish the day; to finish one's life.

Neither count I my life dear unto myself, so that I might finish my course with joy. Acts vi, 24.

So when four years were wholly finished,

She threw her royal robes away.

Tranström, Palace of Art.

2. To bring to completion; complete by making or doing the last or final part of: as, to finish the reading of a book; to finish a task assigned; to finish a house.

He is the halt part of a blessed man,

Left to be finished by such a she.

3. To put an end to; terminate the existence, opposition, etc., of; destroy; as, to finish an enemy by an overwhelming defeat; the last blow finished him. [Now chiefly colloq.]

Seventy weeks are determined upon thy people, and upon thy holy city, to finish the transgression, and to make an end of sins. Dan. ix, 24.

4. To complete and perfect in detail; elaborate carefully; put the final touches on, especially with reference to smoothing and polishing.
Age sets its house in order, and finishes its works, which to every artist is a supreme pleasure. Emerson, Old Age.
I called him Crichton, for he seemed
All perfect, finished to the finger-nail.
Tennyson, Edwin Morris.

To put the finishing hand to. See hand.—Syn. 1 and 2. To end, terminate, close, conclude, complete, perform, achieve.

II. intrans. 1. To arrive at the end; stop.
They say this shall never finish till they have avenged the death of Angus. And then have assembled a great power, and wote to compare this battle he fought.
Merlin (E. E. T. S.), i, 54.

2. To come to an end; terminate; expire.
These her women, . . . who, with wet cheeks,
Were present when she finished.
Shak., Cymbeline, v, 5.

Excuse doth wish
His days may finish ere that hapless time.
Shak., 1 Hen. VI., iii, 1.

finish (fin'ish), n. [< finish, v.] 1. The end or last part of any movement or progress; especially, the end of a race or competitive contest of any kind.

I have followed him through his typical Swedish elk-hunt, and am loth to leave him before he has achieved some sort of success to console him for his disastrous finish. Fortnightly Rev., N. S., XLIII, 102.

2. The last work performed upon any object, whereby it is completed or perfected.—3. Careful elaboration or its result; polish; as, the finish of a work of art, a poem, or a piece of cloth; to put a fine finish on anything, or to give it an exquisite finish; finish in deportment.

To us who write in a hurry for people who read in a hurry, finish would be loss of time. J. Carid.

4. The last hard, smooth coat of plaster on a wall; commonly called hard-finish. Blind finish, in bookbinding, a style of ornamenting book-covers by means of heated stamps, without ink or gold. Carled finish, in metal-work, an ornamental finish giving a curbed appearance to the surface. It is produced by the manipulation of a small strip of oilstone or avr stone.

finished (fin'isht), p. a. Polished to the highest degree of excellence; complete; perfect; as, a finished poem; a finished education.

A finished gentleman is perhaps the most uncommon of all the great characters in life. Shak., Guardian, No. 34.

There are two great and separate senses in which we call a thing finished. . . . One, which refers to the neatness and completeness of the actual work, as we speak of a well finished knife handle or ivory box; and secondly, a sense which refers to the effect produced by the thing done, as we call a picture well finished if it is so full in its details as to produce the effect of reality.

Ruskin, Modern Painters, IV, ix, § 2.

Finished drawing. See demi-fin.—Finished-spirit condenser, that part of a still in which the work of condensation is completed, and from which the hot spirits pass to the refrigerator to be cooled.

finisher (fin'ish-er), n. 1. One who or that which finishes, completes, or perfects.

Jesus, the author and finisher of our faith. Heb. vii, 2.

He that of greatest works is finisher.

Off does them by the weakest minister.

Shak., All's Well, ii, 1.

Specifically: (a) In bookbinding, a workman who takes the incomplete book as left by the forwarder and finishes the work with gilding and decoration by various methods. (b) In stereotyping and electrotyping, a workman who per-fects the face of plates by cutting out superfluous metal, rectifying faults, and correcting errors, for which purpose he cuts out the letters or words to be changed and soldered in separate types or cast pieces. (c) In paper-making, the second rag-pulping machine or half-stuff engine. (d) In the manufacture of fabrics, the final carder or the one that delivers the sliver. See carding machine. (e) In pinpointing machine, the workman who puts the action together and fastens it into the case.

2. One who or that which puts an end to something; in colloquial use, that which settles or puts the finishing touch to something.

"You need go no farther on your flying tour of matrimony; my house and my heart alike are open to you both." "This was a finisher," said Luckington.
T. Hood, Gilbert Gurney, II, vi.

finishing-drill (fin'ish-ing-dril), n. See drill. finishing-press (fin'ish-ing-pres), n. A press used in finishing; specifically, in bookbinding, a simple form of press, usually made of two broad blocks of wood, connected by strong screws of wood, which are intended to hold a book firmly during the process of finishing.

finishing-tool (fin'ish-ing-tōl), n. In lathework, a turning-tool with a cutting edge ground to a large angle. Such tools remove a very thin chip, and are often used simply as scrapers.

finishment, n. [ME. fynysment, fynismant, < OE. finisment, finisment; as finic + -ment.] Finishing; end; death.

Mordyn began to tell the boyynge of Heshu Criste, and of Iosep Abaramathine like as they hadden bened the slayn; and of Pieron, and of other folowes like as they weren departed, and the finysment of Iosep phyl and of alle other.
Merlin (E. E. T. S.), i, 53.

finish-turn (fin'ish-tēr), v. t. To subject to a final operation of turning; finish by the action of an accurate lathe.

They were then finish turned on the parts fitting into the crank-webs. Sci. Amer. Suppl., p. 589.

finitt, n. [< L. finitus, pp. of finire, end; see finile.] A limit. Nares.

And so we early ended our fifth weeks travell, with the finitt of that sheere, at the noble city of Bristol.
MS. Loughborough, 213.

finite (fī'nit), a. and n. [= F. fin = Sp. fin, It. finis, < L. finitus, pp. of finire, end, complete, finish; see finic. Cf. finic, a., ult. a doublet of finile.] I. a. 1. Not too great nor too small to be naturally susceptible of measurement, whether measurable by us or not; not infinite nor infinitesimal. All objects of ordinary experience are finite; God, eternity, immensity, and the like are not finite. Logically, finite means having an end or terminal; but this signification is not co-extensive with the English use of the term. Thus, the circumference of a circle has no ends, yet is finite; while past time has an end, yet is not finite. So, if a finite are be cut out of a parabola, what remains has two ends, yet is not finite.

The obvious portions of extension that affect our senses carry with them into the mind the idea of finite; and the ordinary periods of succession, which by we measure time and duration, as hours, days, and years, are bounded lengths. Locke, Human Understanding, II, xvii, 2.

The following are the special significations of the word: (a) As applied to a class or integer number, capable of being completely counted; this is the fundamental meaning. This distinction between a finite and an infinite class is very important, because there is a peculiar mode of reasoning, called by logicians reasoning by transposed quantity, which is applicable to finite classes alone. The following syllogism is an example: Every Hottentot kills a Hottentot; but no Hottentot is killed by more than one Hottentot; hence, every Hottentot is killed by a Hottentot. It is by the Hottentots is here meant a class of which a complete census might be taken, this conclusion must be true provided the premises are true. But if the generations of Hottentots are everlasting, each Hottentot might kill one of his children, and yet some Hottentots might die natural deaths. Reasoning by transposed quantity is indispensable in the higher arithmetic and algebra; and consequently in these branches of mathematics the distinction between finite and infinite classes is very important. (b) As applied to continuous quantity, smaller than a suitably chosen finite number multiplied into the unit of measurement, and larger than a suitably chosen finite number divided by the unit of measurement.

On account of the finite speed of light, each star appears to describe in space a circle of fixed magnitude, in a plane parallel to that of the ecliptic. Tait, Light, § 60.

(c) In grammar, limited by person; personal; strictly valid; not infinitival nor participial.

2. Subject to limitations or conditions, such as those of space, time, circumstances, and the laws of nature; as, a finite being; finite existence or duration.

Only I discern

Infinito passion and the pain

Of finite hearts that yearn

Keats, Hyperion, Two in the Campagna.

3. Of or pertaining or relating to finite beings; as, finite passions or interests. Calculus of finite differences. See calculus. Finite canon, in music, a canon whose theme comes to a definite end, instead of perpetually returning into itself. See canon. Finite existence, the mode of existence of everything except God; existence in the ordinary sense, not that sending our power to imagine it; contingent existence.—Finite term. (a) In logic, a noun or verb not containing a negative particle, as man, opposed to not-man; also, a proposition containing only finite terms. (b) In math., an integral is said to be expressed in finite terms when it is expressed without resort to an infinite series, although it may be expressed by means of exponential, elliptic, or Abelian functions which are synonymous with infinite series; but frequently expressions involving higher kinds of functions than the exponential and trigonometric are excluded.

II. n. That which is finite: finite things collectively: used only with the definite article.

When one talks of the finite in terms borrowed from the finite . . . his words are not symbols.
O. W. Holmes, Emerson, v.

finite (fī'nīt), v. t.: pret. and pp. finited, ppr. finiting. [< finite, a.] To limit: fix the limits of. [Rare.]

What gives me identity: i. e., what forever fixes or fixes me to my own consciousness, and to others' regard.
H. James, Sibs. and Shad., p. 55.

finiteless (fī'nīt-less), a. [< finite + -less.] Unlimited: infinite.

It is ridiculous unto reason, and finiteless as their desires.
Sir T. Browne, Vulg. Err.

finutely (fī'nūt-lī), adv. In a finite manner or degree: within limits: to a certain degree only.

They are creatures still, and that sets them at an infinite distance from God; whereas all their excellencies can make them but finitely distant from us.
Stillingfleet.

finiteness (fī'nīt-ness), n. The mode or quality of being finite, in any sense; a finite state or condition: limited quality or character as regards extent, duration, power, etc.; as, the finiteness of our natural powers; the finiteness of a number.

The universe, though dependent on the Infinite, is made up of individual limited atoms, and any amount of finiteness added together or multiplied cannot reach infinity.
Bibliotheca Sacra, XIV. 696.

Once alienated from God and plunged into finiteness and consciousness, men defined the powers of nature, or mortal men, or even eternal lusts, as in Aphrodite.
Schaff, Hist. Christ. Church, III. § 11.

finitor (fin'ī-tor), n. [< L. finitor, one who determines boundaries, a surveyor, also (sc. circulus) the horizon, < finire, end, limit, bound; see finish, fin¹.] In astral., the horizon.

finitude (fin'ī-tūd), n. [< L. finitus, pp.; see finite. Cf. infinitude.] The state or mode of being finite; especially, subjection to limitations or conditions: limitation. See finite, 2.

The finitude of the creation, and the finitude of the creature.
Chalmers.

The mind is not finite just because it knows it is finite. . . . It is a flagrant self-contradiction that the finite should know its own finitude.
F. H. Bradley, Ethical Studies, p. 63.

finckle, n. [Also finckle, finckl; < ME. fynkyll, finckel, a var. of fennel, ult. < L. feniculum, dim. of fenum: see fennel.] Fennel.

of Finkle or Fennel, and Hemp.

Holland, tr. of Pliny, xx. 9.

Finlander (fin'tan-dēr), n. [See Finn.] A native or an inhabitant of Finland; a Finn.

finless (fin'less), a. [< fin¹ + -less.] Destitute of fins; as, finless fish.

finlet (fin'let), n. [< fin¹ + -let.] 1. A little fin.—2. Technically, in ichth., detached rays of a dorsal or anal fin, forming a kind of fin, especially in the mackerel family. See Scophthalmus.

Serial correspondence of primitively distinct metameric finlets.
J. A. Ryder.

Finn (fin), n. [Also spelled Fiu; < ME. Finnes, AS. Finnas, pl. Finnas, Finna land, land of the Finns; = Icel. Finnr = Sw. Dan. Finn, Finn; cf. Icel. Finnland, Sw. Dan. Finnland, Finland, said to be a translation, equiv. to 'fenland', of the Finnish name, Suomi or Suomamaa, lit. the swampy region; cf. Icel. Norw. Olden. fen = E. fen.] 1. A native of Finland; a Finlander. —2. Ethnologically—(a) A member of the Finnic race in general. (b) Specifically, a member of that branch of the Finnic race inhabiting Finland and other parts of northwestern Russia, and calling themselves Saami or Suomalaist. See Finnic.

finnac (fin'ak), n. [Also finnack, finnac (and finnery); < Gael. finnac, a white trout, a young salmon, < fionn, white; also called gabail, < gabail, white.] The white trout, a variety of Salmo trutta. [Scotch.]

finnan-haddock, findon-haddock (fin'an-, fin'don-had'ak), n. [< Finnan, a corruption of Finlon, pron. fin'lon, a fishing-village near Aberdeen, Scotland, + haddock.] A common name for moked haddock, especially that raised at Finlon.

finned (fin'd), a. Having a fin or fins, or any thing resembling a fin; especially, having broad edges on either side, as a plow; specifically, in her., having the fins of a different fineture from the rest: said of a fish used as a bearing: as, a fish sable finned or.

They plough up the turf with a broad finned plough.
Mortimer, Husbandry.

finner¹ (fin'ēr), n. [< fin¹ + -er¹.] A fin-whale or a finback; any member of the Balenopteridae. — Oregon finner, the finback whale or razorback, Balenoptera relicta. — Sharp-headed finner, the smallest species of Balenoptera known on the western coast of the United States; the Balenoptera davidsoni; generally called by the whalers a young finback.

finner² (fin'ēr), n. Same as finnac. [Scotch.]

finner-whale (fin'ēr-hwāl), n. Same as finner¹.

Finnic (fin'ik), a. [< Finn + -ic.] Pertaining or relating to the Finns as a race, or to the group of languages spoken by them: Finnish, in the most general sense: as, the Magyars are a Finnic people.

It is maintained by some that the Finnic languages represent the oldest forms among the Uralo-Altaic groups.
Encyc. Brit., IX. 219.

Finnic race, an ethnological group belonging to the Ural-Altaic family of man, scattered over northern Russia and Scandinavia, Siberia, and Hungary, and including the Finns proper, Lapps, Estonians, Livonians, Tchuds, Permians, Ugrians, Ostiaks, Magyars, etc. They all exhibit physical resemblances, and speak similar agglutinative languages, unlike any others spoken in Europe, but related to the Samoyedic, Turkish, Mongolian, and Tungusic languages. Their language is also called Cyrilic and Finnic-Hungarian.

finnick, finnikin, a. and n. See finicking, finikin.

finning (fin'ing), n. The last throes of a whale in dying. See to fin out, under fin¹, v. i.

Finnish (fin'ish), a. and n. [= Sw. Dan. Finsk = Icel. Finnisk; as Finn + -ish¹.] 1. a. Of or pertaining to Finland or its inhabitants, or the Finnic race.

II. The language spoken by the Finns proper, called by themselves Saami. It is a dialect of the Uralian or Finnio-Hungarian branch of the Ural-Altaic or Scythian family, and is proximately related to the Lappish and many languages of the aborigines of Russia, and to the Hungarian. See Finnic.

finny (fin'ī), a. [< fin¹ + -y¹.] 1. Having fins; finned: as, finny fish.

The fish-market was full of finny monsters of the deep, all new and strange to us.
Lady Brassey, Voyage of Sunbeam, I. iv.

2. Fishy: fish-like; of the nature of fish: as, the finny tribes.

She rules the feather'd kind and finny Race.
Congreve, Hymn to Venus.

3. Containing fish: as, the finny deep. Goldsmith.

finchio (fin'ō-ki-ō), n. [It. finocchio, fennel; < L. finiculum, fennel; see fennel.] Faniculum dulce, a variety of fennel; sweet fennel. Loudon.

fines (fē'nōs), n. pl. [Sp. pl. of fino, fine, excellent: see fine².] Wool from merino sheep next in quality to the best; a trade-term.

fin-pike (fin'pik), n. A fish of the family Polypteridae and genus Polypterus; a polypterid. See bichir.

fin-ray (fin'rā), n. One of the rays of the fin of a fish. See the extract, and cut under scapuloracoid.

A form of dermal exoskeleton, which is peculiar to and highly characteristic of fishes, is found in the fin-rays. . . . Ordinary fin-rays are composed of a hornlike, or more or less calcified, substance, and are simple at the base, but become jointed transversely, and split up longitudinally, toward their extremities.
Huxley, Anat. Vert., p. 11.

fin-spine (fin'spīn), n. A spine of a fish's fin; a spinous ray of a fin.

fin-spined (fin'spīnd), a. Having spiny fins; acanthopterygious.

fin¹, v. A Middle English and Anglo-Saxon contraction of findeth. See find.

fin² (fin'tok), n. [< Gael. findach.] A Scottish name for the clonberry, Rubus Chamaemorus.

fin-toed (fin'tōd), a. Same as fin-footed.

finweed (fin'wēd), n. A local English name of the Quercus agrifolia.

fin-whale (fin'hwāl), n. Same as finner¹.

fin-winged (fin'wīngd), a. Having wings like fins or flippers, as a penguin.

fiord, fjord (fyōrd), n. [Also fyord; < Norw. and Dan. fjord = Sw. fjord = Icel. fiörður, a frith, a bay (larger than a rik, a small crescent-shaped inlet or creek); akin to E. ford, and to L. portus, a haven. From the Icel. fiörður comes ME. firth, mod. E. firth, frith: see frith², frith³, ford, port¹.] A deep indentation of the land, forming a comparatively narrow arm of the sea, with more or less precipitous slopes or cliffs on each side. The coast of Norway offers the best examples. True fiords can exist only where a steep and lofty mountain-range borders closely on the sea.

King Olaf's ships came sailing Northward out of Drontheim haven
To the mouth of Salten Fiord.

Longfellow, Saga of King Olaf.

The frozen fiords were fishless,
The earth withheld her grain.

Whittier, Hole of Jarl Thorkell.

We see that, in whatever language it is that Bretonian means a stag's horn, the name was not unfittingly given to the antler-like fiords of this little inland sea.

E. A. Freeman, Venice, p. 312.

fior di persico (fyōr dē pār'si-kō), [It. lit. peach-flower: fior, fiore, < L. flos (flor-), flower; di, < L. de, of; persico, < L. persicum, peach; see flower, de², peach¹.] A rich marble, mottled with red and white, found among Roman ruins in Italy, and often used again in more recent buildings.

fior¹, n. Same as fioret.

fiorin (fī'ō-rin), n. [Ir. fiorthan, a long coarse grass.] An Irish name for white or marsh bent, Agrostis vulgaris, var. alba, a common grass in pastures.

fiore (fiō'rē), n. [< Santa Fiore in Tuscany (where it is found) + -ite².] A variety of silicious sinter found incrusting volcanic tufa. It is found in the vicinity of hot springs and volcanoes in globular, botryoidal, and stalactitic concretions with a pearly luster, and consists of silica (sometimes impure from the presence of alumina), iron peroxide, and water. Geyserite is a variety occurring about the orifices of geysers.

fioritura (fyō-ri-tō'rā), n.; pl. fioriture (-re). [It. lit. a flowering, flourishing, < fiorire, flower, flourish: see flourish.] In music, an ornament or embellishment, as a trill, turn, etc., introduced into a melody: commonly in the plural.

fi¹ (fī), v. t.; pret. and pp. fipped, ppr. fipping. [E. dial., a reduction of fillip or flip¹.] (Cf. G. fippen, fillip, fipps, a fillip.) To fillip. [Prov. Eng.]

fi² (fīp), n. [An abbr. of fippenny.] A fippenny bit. [Local, U. S.]

I haven't hardly a hair left to my hide, or a pewter fi² in my pocket.
S. Judd, Margaret, ii. 7.

fippence (fīp'ens), n. A contracted form of fivepence.

fippenny (fīp'e-nī), a. A contracted form of fivepenny.—Fippenny bit, fivepence; a colloquial name formerly common in Pennsylvania and several of the Southern States for the Spanish half-real, the value of which was about 6 cents.

fipple (fīp'pl), n. [Origin obscure.] 1. The under lip. [Prov. Eng.].—2. A stopper, as at the mouth of a musical wind-instrument.

Some kind of wind instruments are blown at a small hole in the side, which straiteneth the breath of the first entrance; the rather, in respect of their traverse, and stop above the hole, which performeth the fipple's part.
Bacon, Nat. Hist., § 116.

fir (fēr), n. [< ME. fir, far, firre, fyrr, rather from Scand. than from AS. farrh*, which would give ME. furce*, E. furrow* (cf. AS. farrh, a furrow, E. furrow), and is found only in comp., in the single gloss "farrh-woda, pinus," fir-wood, i. e., fir-tree; = OHG. forha, MHG. vorhe, G. föhre = Icel. furu = Norw. fura, furu, fora, foro = Sw. fura, far (in comp. fura-) = Dan. fyrr (in comp. fyrr-), fir (cf. W. pyrr, fir); akin to OHG. verch-eih (cf. E. oak), Lombard. fercha, the Italian oak (L. asculus), G. ferch, oak, = L. quercus, oak; see Quercus. The L. for 'fir' is abies; see Abies. For the relation E. f = L. qu, cf. E. four = L. quattuor. Not related, as sometimes asserted, either to fire, to farze, or to forest.] A coniferous tree, properly of the genus Abies, in distinction from the spruce (Picea); a term also applied, more loosely, to trees of other genera, as Picea and Pinus. See Abies. Among the true firs are the silver firs, Abies pectinata of Europe and A. Numidica of the Atlas mountains; the balsam-fir or balm of Gilead fir of the Alleghenies, A. balsamea; the balsam fir or white fir of the Rocky Mountains, A. concolor; the red firs of the Pacific coast, A. nobilis and A. magnifica; the white fir of the same region, A. grandis; and the sacred fir of Mexico, A. religiosa. Of other genera are the Scotch fir, Pinus sylvestris, and the spruce-fir or Norway spruce, Picea canadica; the red, yellow, or Douglas fir of western America, Pseudotsuga Douglasii; the parasol-fir of Japan, Sciadopitys verticillata; and the plum-fir of Chili, Podocarpus Andina. The gnetaceous genera Ephedra and Gnetum are known as joint-firs.

But how the fyrr was maked up on highte,
And ke the names how the trees highte,
As oak, furce, birch, etc.

Chaucer, Knight's Tale, l. 2063.

Lofty firs which grace the Mountain's Brow.
Congreve, Hymn to Venus.

fir-cone (fēr'kōn), n. The cone-shaped fruit of the fir.

fire (fir), n. [Early mod. E. also fyre; < ME. fire, fir, fyre, fier, fier, fier, fier, etc., < AS. fyr = OS. fūr = OFries. fūr, fūr = D. vier, vuer = MLG. vir, vir, vür, vür, vür, vür, vür = OHG. fuir, later fuir, MHG. vür, vür, vür, vür = Icel. fýri (and poet. furr) = Sw. Dan. fyr = Umbrian pír = Gr. πῦρ, fire (> E. pyre, q. v.), dual. πῦρ (cf. πῦρ, a torch). Different words are used in Goth. (fōn, gen. fīnūs, fire; cf. Icel. fīni, a flame), in L. and Skt. (L. ignis = Skt. agni, fire), and in Rom. (It. fuoco = Sp. fuogo = Pg. fogo = F. feu, fire, < L. focus, fireplace; see fact, focus.)] 1. The visible heat, or light, evolved by the action of a high temperature on certain bodies, which are in consequence styled inflammable or combustible; combustion, or the heat and light evolved during the process of combustion. Anciently, fire, air, earth, and water were regarded as the four elements of which all things are composed; and fire continued until comparatively recent times to be considered a distinct impalpable substance, existing throughout the universe in the supposed form of caloric. See combustion, flame.

The Lindsays flew like fire about,
Till all the fray was done.

Battle of Otterbourne (Child's Ballads, VII. 24).

Thou wouldst as soon go kindle fire with snow
As seek to quench the fire of love with words.
Shak., T. G. of V., ii. 7.

Wheresoe'er I am, by night and day,
All earth and air seem only burning fire.
Tennyson, Enone.

In popular language, the word element is often referred to fire, air, earth, and water. A very slight acquaintance with chemistry is sufficient to prove that air, earth, and water are compound bodies, and that fire is mainly the result of a high temperature on certain bodies.

W. A. Miller, Elem. of Chem., § 1.

2. Fuel in a state of combustion, as on a hearth or the ground, or in a grate, stove, or furnace; a burning mass of material lighted for the sake of warmth or for the utilization of the heat or light from it.

Bryng in fire on alhalawgh day.

To conbuhas enen, I dar well say.
Babes Book (E. E. T. S.), p. 311.

And ther with owt the Door in the Courte, on the left honde, ys a tree with many stonys a bowght it, wher the ministres of the Jewys and Seynt Petir with them warnyd them by the fyre.

Torkington, Diario of Eng. Travell, p. 35.

Now the king sat in the winterhouse in the ninth month; and there was a fire on the hearth burning before him.
Jer. xxxvi. 22.

In winter's tedious nights sit by the fire
With good old folks.
Shak., Rich. II., v. 1.

3. The burning of any large collection of material, as a building, town, forest, etc.; a conflagration: as, the great fire of London or of Chicago; a forest or a prairie fire.

A fire is foul affray in thinges drie.

Palladius, Husbandrie (E. E. T. S.), p. 28.

Where two raging fires meet together,
They do consume the thing that feeds their fury.
Shak., T. of the S., ii. 1.

Grub-street! thy fall should men and gods conspire,
Thy stage shall stand, ensure it but from fire.
Pope, Dunciad, iii. 3.

Till the last fire burn all between the poles.
Carper, Conversation, l. 756.

4. A spark or sparks; specifically, a spark, as from red-hot iron, or from flint or other stones when struck.

His spurs of steel were sair to bide,

And fra her fore-feet flew the nie.
Anna Water (Child's Ballads, II. 188).

5. Flashing light; vivid luster; splendor.
She is very beautiful, and very like her father, with eyes full of fire, and great expression in all her features.
Macauley, Life and Letters, I. 211.

6. In precious stones, the quality of refracting and dispersing light, and the brilliancy of effect that comes from this quality.—7. A luminous body; a star. [Poetical.]

Before him burn
Seven lamps, as in a zodiac representing The heavenly fires.
Milton, P. L., xii. 256.

Yon fair stars,
Cold fires, yet with power to burn and brand
His nothingness into man.
Tennyson, Maud, xviii.

8. A sensation of internal heat arising from either a physical or a mental cause; an inflammatory process or effect.

What fire is in mine ears? Shak., Much Ado, iii. 1.

9. Ardor; burning desire; passionate love for something.

Out he flash'd,
And into such a song, such fire for fame,
Such trumpet-blowings in it,
That when he stopt, we long'd to hurl together.
Tennyson, Merlin and Vivien.

10. Consuming violence, as of temper; fierceness; vehemence; as, the fire of love or of enmity.

For Wealth he seeks, nor feels Ambition's Fire,
Congreve, tr. of Ovid's Art of Love.

He had fire in his temper.
Ips. Atterbury.

11. Liveliness of imagination; vigor of fancy; force of sentiment or expression; capacity for ardor and zeal; animation; vivacity.

Old as we are, our soul retains a fire

Active and quick in motion.
Ford, Fancies, v. 1.

His fire is out, his wit decayed.
Swift, Death of Dr. Swift.

Mrs. Rebecca Quickly, whom he married, had all that the fire of youth and a lively manner could do towards making an agreeable woman.
Steele, Spectator, No. 160.

And bless their critic with a poet's fire.

Pope, Essay on Criticism, l. 676.
Pitt's . . . ardour and his noble bearing put fire into the most frigid heart.
Macauley, William Pitt.

12. Subjection to evil effects of any kind; especially, overwhelming trouble; severe trial; used with reference to the old or savage practice of trial or torture by fire, and especially to the passing through the fire to Moloch mentioned in the Bible; as, to pass through or be subjected to the fires of affliction.

Not passing thro' the fire
Bodies, but souls—thy children's—thru' the smoke,
The blight of low desires.
Tennyson, Aylmer's Field.

13. [< fire, v. l., 6.] The firing or discharge of firearms; the discharge of a number of firearms, as rifles, muskets, or cannon, from a body of troops; a battery, or the like; as, to be under fire; to silence the enemy's fire; enfilade and ricochet fire, etc. Artillery fire is said to be direct when the line of fire is perpendicular to the line aimed at, and the projectile does not touch the intermediate ground; oblique when the line of fire makes an angle less than 90° with the front of the object; enfilading when the line of fire is nearly parallel to the parapet or line of troops to be swept; reverse when the line of fire forms a horizontal angle greater than 90° with the interior slope of the parapet or the line of troops exposed to its effects; shut when the angle made with the interior slope is less than 30°; horizontal when the piece has but a small angle of elevation and the projectile strikes the object without striking the intermediate ground; vertical when the piece has a great angle of elevation, as in the case of mortars; ricochet when the elevation is slight and the projectile strikes the earth or water and rebounds one or more times (used chiefly with reduced charges for enfilading purposes); rolling when the axis of the piece is parallel to the ground, or nearly so, and the projectile makes a series of ricochets; plunging when the piece is situated above the plane of the object fired at.

Bullets would sing by our foreheads, and bullets would rain at our feet.
Fire from ten thousand at once of the rebels that girdled us round.
Tennyson, Defence of Lucknow.

They were under fire for more than two hours, and every vessel was struck many times, but with little damage to the gunboats.
U. S. Grant, Personal Memoirs, I. 463.

A dropping fire. See drop, v. l. A flaught o' fire. See flaught. Artillery fire. See artillery. Ascending fires. See firework. Baptism of fire. See baptism. Blind fire. See blind. Center fire. See center fire. Central fire, a fire which, according to the Pythagoreans, occupies the center of the universe and was the first thing made, being the germ of every thing else. Copernicus and others supposed the sun was intended. Chinese fire, a composition used in fireworks. It consists of 16 parts of gunpowder, 8 of niter, 3 of charcoal, 10 of small cast iron borings, and 3 of sulphur. Colored fires, the tinted flames produced by the salts of barium, strontium, sodium, copper, and other metals, or the compositions used to produce such flames. Various mixtures are employed, and the lights are used for signals, in pyrotechny, etc.—Cross fire. See crossfire. Curved fire. See the extract.

When a projectile is fired so as just to clear an intervening cover, and then descend upon the object, the line of fire being perpendicular or nearly so to the front of troops or works to be destroyed, such practice is termed curved fire, in order to distinguish it from ricochet.

Farrar, Mil. Encey., I. 441.

Elmo's fire. Same as corpusant. False fire. (a) A blue flame made by burning certain combustibles in a wooden tube, used as a signal during the night. (b) A fire kindled with the object of leading a ship to destruction; a false or misleading beacon.

Shipwrecked, kindles on the coast
False fires, that others may be lost.
Wordsworth, To Lady Fleming.

Fire of the periphery, a fire which, according to the Pythagoreans and other ancient philosophers, occupies the circumference of the universe. Fixed fires. See firework. Greek fire, a combustible composition the constituents of which are supposed to have been asphalt, niter, and sulphur. It would burn on or under water, and was used with great effect in war by the Greeks of the Eastern Empire, who kept its composition secret for several hundred years. Upon the conquest of Constantinople the secret came into the possession of the Mohammedans, to whom it rendered repeated and valuable service. Also Grecian fire.

The Saracens, by throwing Greek fire on the Christians, burnt many of their boats and killed the people in them, thus obtaining the victory.

Quoted in Herriot's Ancient Armour, I. 328.

Hollow fire. (a) A peculiar kind of hearth or furnace used in the manufacture of iron for tin-plates, and so arranged that the metal, in the form of "stamps" (bars broken into pieces weighing about a quarter of a hundred each), is heated in the flames, and does not come in direct contact with the fuel, thus avoiding contamination by sulphur. (b) A fire burning chiefly in the interior of the mass of fuel, so as to avoid waste of the coal by combustion on the outside, where it is not in contact with the metal. For the common blacksmith's fires, small but numerous coal is preferred. Holy fire, in the Roman Catholic and oriental churches, a light kindled on Holy Saturday (the Saturday preceding Easter Sunday) by sparks from a flint, and used to relight the church lamps, all of which are extinguished on Good Friday. In the Greek Church the fire is claimed to be a miraculous gift from heaven. At Rome the ceremony is performed in presence of the pope. At Jerusalem the lighting of the holy fire is celebrated by the Greek and Armenian clergy combined in the church of the Holy Sepulcher, amid a scene of wild enthusiasm on the part of the spectators. Kentish fire. See Kentish.

Letters of fire and sword, in the ancient law of Scotland, letters of appointment issued by the Privy Council, and directed to the sheriff of the county, authorizing him to call the assistance of the county to dispossess a tenant who retained his possession contrary to the order of the judge and the diligence of the law. Line of fire (ambly), a line formed by the prolongation of the axis of a firearm forward. Oblique fire, a phrase denoting a form of action in firearms, in which the plunger which explodes the cartridge moves obliquely to the axis of the barrel. On fire, ignited; inflamed; burning; hence, figuratively, eager; ardent; zealous. See afire.

Receiv'd my heart an offering all on fire,
Kindled, and fed, and blown by strong Desire.
J. Beaumont, Psyche, ii. 88.

All fiets

But chafing me on fire to find my bride.

Tennyson, Princess, I.

Out of the frying-pan into the fire. See frying-pan.

Primitive fire, a fire which, according to Heraclitus and other ancient philosophers, was the primitive material out of which the universe was formed.—Rotating fires. See firework. Running fire (ambly), the rapid discharge of firearms by a line of troops in succession. St. Anthony's fire. Same as ergasilus. St. Elmo's fire. Same as corpusant. St. Francis's fire, probably the same as St. Anthony's fire.

All these, and many evils more haunt me,
The swelling Spence, and Frenzy raging fire,
The shaking Palsey, and Saint Francis's fire.
Spenser, F. Q., I. iv. 35.

The fat is in the fire. See fat. To bank a fire, to give fire, to hang fire. See the verbs.—To heap coals of fire on one's head. See coal. To play with fire, to meddle carelessly or ignorantly with a dangerous matter; do anything lightly or for amusement that may cause great trouble or suffering.—To pour oil on the fire, to add fuel to the flame—that is, to do or say something likely to intensify existing passion or trouble.—To set on fire. (a) To apply fire to; cause to burn.

And [they] abide so in this manner till tidings come to them, that her enemies were entered into the house that set on fire over all their as they might enjoy him do.
Martin (L. E. T. S.), iii. 380.

Now the children of Judah had fought against Jerusalem . . . and set the city on fire.
Judges i. 8.

(b) Figuratively, to make fiery; inflame; excite violently.

The tongue . . . setteth on fire the course of nature; and it is set on fire of hell.
Jas., in 6.

To set the river (or the Thames, Hudson, or other river, according to locality) on fire, to accomplish something surprising or remarkable; cut a figure in the world; always used with a negative; as, he is a smart fellow enough, but he'll never set the river on fire. See trough.

To strike fire, to produce a spark or flame by friction or concussion.

Steeking fire, I kindled some heat and dry sea-weed, by which I roasted my eggs.
Swift, Gulliver's Travels, iii. 1.

To take fire. (a) To become ignited; begin to burn.

The sapless wood, divested of the bark,
Grows fungous, and takes fire at every spark.
Carper, Conversation, l. 74.

(b) Figuratively, to become inflamed; be violently excited or aroused.

I am no courtier, of a light condition,
Apt to take fire at every beauteous face,
That only serves his will and wantonness.
Fletcher (and another), Elder Brother, iv. 3.

White Bengal fire, a very brilliant light produced by means of pure metallic arsenic.

fire (fir), v.: pret. and pp. fired, fired, firing. [< ME. firan, fyrn, furn, furn, set on fire, expose to fire, animate, < AS. fyrrian, furn only in the sense of 'give warmth to,' = D. vuren = MLG. vuren, LG. fūren = Sw. fyr = Dan. fyr, fire; from the noun.] I. trans. 1. To set on fire; to kindle; as, to fire a house or a chimney; to fire a pile.

And of a certain hearth, which, being folded up in a man's clothes, would make him walk invisible, & the smoke of the same, being fired, would cause thunder.
Purcell, Pyramage, p. 61.

Reedsdale has fired our house.

Reedsdale and W. William (Child's Ballads, VIII. 91).
Captain Swan ordered the Town to be fired, which was presently done.
Daniel's Voyages, I. 145.

2. To expose to the action of fire; prepare by the application of heat; bake: as, to fire pottery; to fire a stack of bricks. [Rarely used of culinary processes.]

The dough is . . . cut into small scones, which, when fired, are handed round the company.
Rev. J. Nicol, Poems, I. 28, note

melt, nor even perceptibly soften when exposed to a high temperature. The most important articles made of fire-clay are fire-bricks and crucibles. Much of the clay associated with the coal of the Carboniferous series is sufficiently refractory to be used for this purpose. Stourbridge, Worcestershire, England, is a locality famous for manufactures of this kind. In New Jersey a belt of rocks of Cretaceous age extends across the State, from Staten Island south-west to the Delaware, with which are associated clays of various kinds. Along this belt the manufacture of fire-bricks and crucibles is a business of importance.

fire-cock (fir'kok), n. A cock or spout to let out water for extinguishing fire.

fire-company (fir'kum pa-ni), n. 1. A company of men for managing an engine to extinguish fires.—2. A fire-insurance company.

fire-cracker (fir'krak ér), n. A species of fire-work consisting of a paper cylinder filled with a preparation of gunpowder, etc., stopped at each end, furnished with a fuse, and discharged for the sake of the noise of its explosion. It is of Chinese make.

We celebrated the termination of our trouble by setting off two packs of fire-crackers in an empty wine-cask. They made a prodigious racket. T. E. Aldrich, Bad Boy, p. 39.

firecrest (fir'krest), n. The fire-crested wren of Europe, Regulus ignicapillus.

fire-crested (fir'kres'ted), a. Having the crest of a fiery color; as, the fire-crested wren.

fire-cross (fir'krós), n. The fiery cross (which see, under cross).

What is this, but to blow a trumpet, and proclaim a fire-cross to a hereditary and perpetual civil war? Milton, Reformation in Eng., ii.

fire-damp (fir'damp), n. The gas contained in coal, often given off by it in large quantities, and exploding, on ignition, when mixed with atmospheric air. Explosion takes place when, as is often the case, the gas given off by the coal consists largely of marsh-gas (light carbureted hydrogen). The composition of the gas evolved from coal is, however, very variable; in connection with the marsh-gas, oxygen, carbonic acid, and nitrogen seem to be always present. Fire-damp is a source of great danger to life in coal mines. See damp.

fire-department (fir'dē-pārt'ment), n. A department of the government of a city, town, or village charged with the prevention and the extinction of fires; also, the entire force of men employed in this service.

fire-doff (fir'dōf'), a. In brick-manuf., noting the condition of a heated kiln immediately after the fire has expended itself. Also called burnt-doff.

If it is desired to admit hot air to the upper part of any kiln, this may be done by opening the dampers . . . at the top of a fire-doff kiln. C. T. Davis, Bricks, etc., p. 284.

fire-dog (fir'dog), n. Same as andron.

The great iron fire-dogs, at least four feet in height, were connected from shaft to shaft by a chain, in grotesque suggestion of the Siamese twins.

Harpers Mag., LXXVI, 212.

fire-door (fir'dör), n. The feeding- or charging-door of any form of furnace.

fire-drake (fir'drak), n. [ME. fire-drake, < AS. fyrdraca (= G. Feuerdrachen), < fyr, fire, + draca, drake, dragon; see drake, dragon.] 1. A fiery dragon or serpent.

By the hissing of the snake,
The rustling of the fire-drake.

Drayton, Symphidia.

It may be 'tis but a glow-worm now; but 'twill Grow to a fire-drake presently.

Fletcher, Beggars' Bush, v. 1.

Here [Masjid el Jimi] was recalled the seventy-second chapter of the Koran, called after the name of the mysterious fire-drakes who paid fealty to the Prophet.

R. F. Burton, El-Mednah, p. 472.

2. A fiery meteor; an ignis fatuus.

Fiery spirits or devils are such as commonly work by blazing stars, fire-drakes, or ignis fatui.

Burton, Anat. of Mel., p. 120.

So have I seen a fire-drake glide at midnight
Before a dying man to point his grave.

Chapman, Cesar and Pompey, iii. 1.

3. A kind of firework.

That fire-drake did I but three times on the head, and three times has his nose discharged against me; he stands there, like a mortar piece, to blow us.

Shaks., Hen. VIII., v. 3.

How many oaths flew toward heaven
Which ne'er came half-way thither, but, like fire-drakes, Mounted a little, gave a crack, and fell.

Middleton, Your Five Gallants, iii. 2.

4. A worker at a furnace or fire; an allusive use.

That is his fire-drake.

His lungs, his Zephyrus, he that puffs his coals.

B. Jonson, Alchemist, ii. 1.

fire-dress (fir'dres), n. An invention used as a protection against fire, with the view of enabling the wearer to approach and even to pass through a fierce flame, to rescue lives or valuable property, or to use means for the extinction of fire. It consists of an exterior light armor of metallic gauze, and of an inner covering of a material which is a slow conductor of heat, such as wool, cotton, etc., immersed in certain saline solutions.

fire-eater (fir'ē-tēr), n. 1. A juggler who pretends to eat fire.

I took leave of my Lady Sunderland. She made me stay dinner at Leicester House, and afterwards sent for Richardson, the famous fire-eater. He devoured him-stone, on glowing coals before us, chewing and swallowing them, he melted a beer-glass, and eat it quite up, etc.

Edgyn, Diary, Oct. 8, 1672.

2. A person of recklessly defiant disposition, especially a persistent duelist; specifically, in the United States, before the civil war, a violent and bitter Southern partisan. [Colloq.]

Barnes need not get up in the morning to punch Jack Babbs's head. I'm sorry for your disappointment, you Fourth-street fire-eater. Thackeray, Newcomes, xxix.

All parties joined in this measure: the fire-eaters to promote secession, the Unionists to thwart it.

The Century, XXXVI, 76.

fire-eating (fir'ē'ting), a. Having the disposition or spirit of a fire-eater, in sense 2; recklessly defiant and fiery.

fire-engine (fir'en jin), n. 1. An early name for the steam-engine.

First, That vessel in which the powers of steam are to be employed to work the engine, which is called the cylinder in common fire-engines, and which I call the steam-vessel, must, during the whole time the engine is at work, be kept as hot as the steam that enters it.

Watt, quoted in Encyc. Brit., XXII, 475.

2. An engine designed to throw a continuous stream of water through a hose upon a conflagration, for the purpose of extinguishing it.

Fire-engine.

Fire-engines are of three principal kinds: hand-power, steam, and chemical, according to the power employed. Hand-power fire-engines consist in the main of a pair of single-acting force-pumps, mounted on wheels, and worked by hand. They have been generally superseded by the application of steam. Steam fire-engines consist essentially of a pair of single-acting suction- and force-pumps operated by steam, the whole apparatus being mounted on wheels and drawn by horses, or sometimes self-propelled. The chemical fire-engine is a large form of fire-extinguisher mounted on wheels and drawn by horses. Floating fire-boats and steam fire-engines are used in large ports, for the protection of shipping and the water-fronts.

fire-escape (fir'es-kāp'), n. Any apparatus or structure designed to enable persons to escape from the upper windows of a building in case of fire. Portable fire-escapes consist generally of ladders, often mounted on wheels for ease in transportation, and capable of being extended like a telescope; permanent fire-escapes consist usually of light iron ladders and landings attached to the outside of a building.

fire-extinguisher (fir'eks-ting'wish-ēr), n. An apparatus designed for immediate and temporary use in putting out a conflagration by means of a small stream of water or of water mingled with carbonic-acid gas. In the commonest form water is placed in a metal holder or vessel, and above it, within the holder, is placed a smaller vessel containing a chemical, as sulphuric acid, that may be set free by the turning of a handle or screw on the outside of the apparatus. Another chemical, commonly sodium bicarbonate, is also placed in the apparatus. When the acid is set free it combines with the sodium, setting free carbonic acid gas, which, by its pressure, escapes when a nozzle is opened, carrying the water with it in a strong stream. Such extinguishers are usually made portable, to be carried in the hand or upon the back, or are mounted upon a light truck to be drawn by a horse; but they are also made in heavier forms, when they are commonly called chemical fire-engines.

fire-eye (fir'ī), n. One of the South American ant-thrushes, Formicivora (Pyrrhuloxia) leucopura; so called from its red eyes.

fire-eyed (fir'īd), a. Having eyes of fire. [Poetical.]

They come like sacrifices in their trim,
And to the fire-eyed band of smoky war.

All hot and bleeding, will we offer them

Shaks., Hen. IV., iv. 1.

fire-fan (fir'fan), n. A blast-apparatus of small size, suitable to be used at a small or portable force.

fire-fanged (fir'fāngd), a. [= Sc. firefangt; < fire + fangd, pp. of fāng, take, seize.] Dried up as by fire, specifically (a) Applied to manure which has assumed a baked appearance, from the heat evolved during decomposition. (b) Applied to bones, when scalded or cracked, as a result of being exposed to much heat before it has been dried. Jamieson.

fire-feeder (fir'fē-dēr), n. An apparatus for feeding the fire of a furnace.

A properly constructed fire-feeder, which would supply the furnace without involving the necessity of opening the fire doors.

R. Armstrong, in Chambers Mech. Engineering, p. 24.

fire-fiend (fir'fēnd), n. 1. Fire, as of a conflagration, personified as an evil spirit of destruction.—2. An incendiary. [Colloq.]

fire-finch (fir'finch), n. A weaver-bird of the genus Euphonia; as, the flame-colored fire-finch (E. ayacolor).

fire-fishing (fir'fish'ing), n. Fishing by fire-light, as when blazing torches are used to attract fish to a boat or to the side of a stream, so that they may be caught or speared. Also called torch-fishing.

fire-flag (fir'flag), n. A flash or gleam of lightning. [Rare and poetical.]

The upper air burst into fire!

And a hundred fire-flags shewn. Coleridge.

fireflare, fireflare (fir'flār), n. Same as fire-flare.

fire-flaught (fir'flāt), n. [Sc., also written fire-flaucht; < fire + flaught, flaucht; see flaucht.] 1. A flash of lightning; specifically, a flash unaccompanied by thunder.

The flamb of fire-flaucht lighting here and there.

Gavin Douglas, tr. of Virgil, p. 107.

Even Goneril has her one splendid hour, her fire-flaucht of hellish glory. Swanburne, Shakespeare, p. 173.

2. The northern light, or aurora borealis.

firefirt (fir'fīrt), n. Same as firefirt. 2. C. Swainson, [Local, Eng.]

firefly (fir'flī), n.; pl. fireflies (-flīz). An insect which has the faculty of becoming luminous; a lampyrid or elaterid beetle which emits phosphorescent light from organs in some part of the body. One of the commonest American species is a lampyrid, Photinus pyralis, vulgarly called lightning-bug. Its larva lives in the ground, feeding on earthworms and soft-bodied insects, and transforms to the pupa in an oval earthen cell in June, issuing as a beetle ten days later. In the genus Photurus the larva is luminous. The larger tropical fireflies belong to the elaterid genus Purophorus, and are known as cicadares. One of the most brilliant is P. noctilucus of South America and the West Indies, emitting such luminosity from two eye-like fe-nesting on the thorax that small point may be read by this light. The insects are sometimes used to afford light for domestic purposes, several of them combined together emitting light enough to enable a person to write. The glow-worm is, however, a lampyrid. The lantern fly is a homopterous insect of a different order.

Many a night I saw the Pleiads, rising thro' the mellow shade, Glitter like a swarm of fire-flies tangled in a silver braid.

Tennyson, Locksley Hall.

fire-fork (fir'fōrk), n. [ME. fyrgforke; < fire + forke.] A fork-shaped implement used for piling fagots upon a fire.

fire-gilding (fir'gil ding), n. A gilding process in which the gold is put on in the form of an amalgam of gold and mercury, and then heated in a muffle. The mercury escaping leaves a film of gold.

Fire-gilding may furnish gilding with a bright or dead lustre, scratch-brushed, ornamental, and also with different shades.

Wahl, Galvanoplastie, Manipulation, p. 219.

fire-gilt (fir'gilt), a. Treated by the process of fire-gilding; as, a fire-gilt vase.

fire-god (fir'god), n. The power of fire personified as a spirit; a god of fire.

If we are to derive the notion that Jahve is a "fire-god" from such language as "Thou overest thyself with light as with a garment" (Ps. cxvi. 1), we may as well attribute the same idea to Paul, when he describes God as "dwelling in light unapproachable" (1 Tim. i. 17). Calv., 714.

fire-grate (fir'grāt), n. The grate to hold the fuel in common use in domestic fireplaces and in many forms of heaters and furnaces.

The furnace itself is as already stated the ordinary one only, in place of the fire-grate, passages are built for the admission of gas and air.

W. B. D., IV, 553.

fire-guard (fir'gārd), n. A framework of wire placed in front of a fireplace as a protection.

fire-holder (fir'hôl dër), n. A receptacle for carrying fire. See the extract.

At a later period, the light for igniting the matches was carried by a slow-burning incense contained in a metal case perforated with small holes to afford egress for the smoke. These fire-holders were usually attached to the middle.

W. W. Greener, The Gun, p. 45.

fire-hole (fir'hôl), n. A hole cut through the ice near a camp or a ship which has been frozen in, for the purpose of drawing water to extinguish any accidental fire.

The crew . . . had been employed in their ordinary daily duties, such as cleaning decks, keeping the fire-hole open, procuring ice, and other like work.

C. F. Hall, Polar Exp., p. 217.

fire-hook (fir'hûk), n. [< ME. fyrehoke (= D. vurhauk = M.Lt. virhake = G. feuerhaken = ODan. fyrrhag); < fire + hook.] 1. A strong iron hook used at fires in tearing away burning timbers, etc. Such hooks are usually operated by a special corps called a hook-and-ladder company.

Also, that ther be v. fyrr hooks, to drawe at enery thyng wher payre of fyrrys in eny parte of the cite.

English Gilds (E. E. T. S.), p. 385.

A firehook, such as they occupy to pull downe houses set on fire.

Nomenclator.

2. A heavy rake for stirring a furnace-fire. fire-house (fir'hous), n. A house containing a fire; a dwelling-house, as opposed to a barn, stable, or other outhouse. [Obsolete or provincial.]

Peter-pence to the Pope of Rome to be paid out of every fire-house in England.

Fulter, Ch. Hist., II. iii, 13.

fire-hunt (fir'hunt), n. A hunt in which a light is used to reveal or attract the game.

fire-hunt (fir'hunt), v. t. To hunt at night, using a torch or other light to reveal or attract the game; practise fire-hunting.

fire-hunting (fir'hun ting), n. A method or practice of hunting at night with lights which reveal the game, usually by the reflection from its eyes, or attract it to the hunter. See floating, jacking, shining, torching.

Fire-hunting is never tried in the cattle country; . . . the streams are not suited to the floating or jacking with a lantern in the bow of the canoe, as practised in the Adirondacks.

T. Roosevelt, Hunting Trips, p. 168.

fire-insurance (fir'in-shôr ans), n. Insurance against loss by fire. See insurance.

fire-iron (fir'î ern), n. [< ME. fyrrîren, fyrrgrȳn, fyrrre (= ODan. fyrrjærn), iron or steel for striking fire with flint; < fire + iron. Cf. fire-steel.] 1. Iron or steel for striking fire with flint.

Now he gets hym flint,
His fyrrre he hent,
And thome withoutene any stynt
He kyndit a ghode.

Sir Perceval, l. 753 (Thornton Rom., ed. Halliwell).

2. pl. Utensils employed for managing a fire, consisting of poker, shovel, and tongs.

fire-kiln (fir'kil), n. An oven or place for heating anything. Synonyms.

fire-ladder (fir'lad'îr), n. A fire-escape.

fire-leaves (fir'lêvz), n. pl. A name given in some parts of England to the leaves of the plantain and devil's-bit, from the belief that they induce fermentation in newly stored hay.

fireless (fir'les), a. [< fire + -less.] Destitute of fire.

The unsheltered, fireless soldiers.

The Century, XXIX, 295.

firelight (fir'lit), n. 1. The light emitted by a fire, especially an open fire of any kind.

Shadows from the litful fire light
Dance upon the parlor wall.

Longfellow, Footsteps of Angels.

2. Same as fire light.

fire-lighter (fir'li tîr), n. A composition of inflammable materials, as pitch and sawdust, used for kindling fires.

firelock (fir'lok), n. A musket or other gun discharged by means of some mechanical device which causes sparks by friction or concussion; specifically, a flintlock; distinguished from and superseding the matchlock, which was fired with a match; hence, one armed with such a gun. See cut under flintlock.

The day following we were faine to hire a strong convoy
Of firelocks to guard us through the cord woods.

Poehn, Diary, Jan. 25, 1845.

fire-mace (fir'mas), n. An incendiary weapon of ancient warfare, consisting of a vessel of pottery or glass filled with combustible fluid, and usually thrown from a military engine. The vessel is so shaped, and distributed its burning matter, that it is often charged with Greek fire which is a cut under fire. The name probably had its origin in the bulbous or club-like shape of the vessel.

fire-main (fir'mân), n. A pipe for water to be employed in case of conflagration.

fireman (fir'mân), n.; pl. firemen (-men). 1. One of an organized company, in a city or town, whose business it is to extinguish or prevent conflagrations; a member of a fire-company.

Oh! it's only the firemen a-swearin'
At a man they've run over and kill'd!

Hood, Don't you Smell Fire?

2. One of the crew of a gun in the United States navy whose duty it is to assist in extinguishing fire, especially during a battle.—3. A man employed in tending fires, as of a steam-engine; a stoker.

The fireman can not cram too much pine into the furnace.

W. M. Baker, New Timothy, p. 16.

4. In coal-mining, a person charged with the special duty of examining every morning the working-places and roads of a pit to ascertain if fire-damp is present.

fire-marble (fir'mâr'bl), n. Same as lunachel.

fire-master (fir'mâs tîr), n. 1. An officer of artillery who superintends the composition of fireworks. [Rare.]

Fire-master, in our train of artillery, is an officer who gives directions, and the proportions of the ingredients, for all the compositions of Fire-works, whether for service in war, or for rejoicings and recreations.

Chambers's Cyc. (London, 1741), quoted in N. and Q., 7th ser., III, 479.

2. In Great Britain, the chief of a fire-brigade.

fire-new (fir'nû), a. [< fire + new; = OD. fiernieu = G. feuerneu = ODan. fyrrny. Cf. brand-new.] Fresh from the forge; bright; brand-new.

Peace, master marquis, you are malapert:

Your fire-new stamp of honour is scarce current.

Shak., Rich. III., I. 3.

With always some fire-new project in his brain, J. E. is the systematic opponent of innovation.

Lamb, My Relations.

fire-office (fir'of'is), n. A fire-insurance office. [Eng.]

fire-opal (fir'ô'pal), n. A variety of opal. See girasol.

fire-ordeal (fir'ôr'dê'al), n. [< fire + ordeal; = OD. microordeel (mod. uurproof).] An ancient mode of trying an accused person by means of fire. See ordeal.

fire-pan (fir'pan), n. [< ME. fyrrpanne, < AS. fyrrpanne (= OD. vierpanne, D. vierpan = OHG. fyrrphanna, G. feuerpfanne = ODan. fyrrpande = Sw. fyrrpanna), a chafing-dish, < fyrr, fire, + panne, pan.] 1. A pan or other receptacle for holding fire or live coals. (a) A chafing-dish or a brazier.

A fire pan, such is used in barbers shops and others, in cold weather.

Nomenclator.

(b) A fire-pot; a grate.

The place where fire is made, as a hearth moveable or a fyrrpanne, focus.

Withals, Dict. (ed. 1608), p. 183.

(c) A pan or grate used to carry fire in fire-hunting. (d) In the English version of the Bible, used to translate a Hebrew word elsewhere rendered "censer" and "smell-dish."

And thou shalt make his pans to receive his ashes, and his shovels, and his basons, and his fleshhooks, and his fyrrpans.

Ex. xxvii, 3.

2. In a firelock, the receptacle for the priming-powder.

fire-pike (fir'pik), n. A poker; an instrument used in stirring a fire. [Prov. Eng.]

fireplace (fir'pläs), n. The part of a chimney which opens into an apartment, and in which fuel is burned; in a restricted sense, a place for a fire in which the fuel is supported on andirons or is placed upon the hearth. The bottom or floor of the fireplace is called the hearth, sometimes the inner hearth; a broad flat stone placed in front of the hearth is called the slab or outer hearth. The vertical sides of the fireplace-opening are termed the jambs, and the lintel which lies on them is called the mantel. The part of the wall immediately above the mantel is called the breast, and the wall behind the fireplace the back. The tube which conveys the smoke from the fireplace to the top of the chimney is called the flue. The fireplace-cavity being much wider than the flue, they are joined by a tapering portion, at the narrowest part of which there is often a damper for regulating the draft. The fuel is burned on andirons or, if coal, in an iron receptacle or grate.

The fireplaces were of a truly patriarchal magnitude, where the whole family, old and young, master and servant, black and white, nay, even the very cat and dog, enjoyed a community of privilege, and had each a right to a corner.

Trivedi, Knickerbocker, p. 168.

Covings of a fireplace. See oving.

fire-plug (fir'plug), n. A device for connecting the supply-pipe of a fire-engine with a water-main in case of fire.

fire-point (fir'point), n. A poker. [Prov. Eng.]

fire-policy (fir'pol'î-si), n. A written instrument whereby, in consideration of a single payment or of periodical payments of premiums, an insurance company engages, under certain specified conditions, to make good to the insured person such loss as may occur by fire to his property, described in the policy, within the period therein specified, and usually not exceeding a specified sum.

fire-pot (fir'pot), n. 1. A vessel used in ancient warfare to contain combustible fluid, and dropped from the walls or thrown from a military engine. Compare fire-mace.—2. That part of a furnace in which the fire is made.—3. A solderers' furnace.—4. A crucible.

fire-proof (fir'prüf), a. Proof against fire; so constructed or protected as to be incombustible. Buildings are rendered fire-proof by the exclusive use in their construction of non-combustible materials, as stone, brick, iron, cement, concrete, and asbestos. In the case of textile fabrics, as cotton and linen, the means adopted is saturation with various salts, as borax, which leave their crystals in the substance of the fabric. Wood is best protected by silicate of soda, which on the application of strong heat fuses into a glass, and not only enveloping the outside, but also filling the internal pores of the wood, shields it from contact with the oxygen of the air. All that can be done to protect combustible materials by any process, however, is the prevention of conflagration; no process yet known can prevent smoldering.

fireproof (fir'prüf), v. t. [< fire-proof, a.] To render proof against fire by some protecting cover, by chemical treatment, or by construction with incombustible materials.

fireproofing (fir'prüf'ing), n. [Verbal n. of fireproof, v.] 1. The act of rendering fire-proof: as, the fireproofing of cloth.

A porous tile for fireproofing has been introduced.

Workshop Receipts, 2d ser., p. 293.

2. Material for use in making anything fire-proof.

fire-quarters (fir'kwâr'tîr), n. Naut., the stations of a ship's company for extinguishing fires; also, the assembling of a ship's company at their stations when an alarm of fire is given.

firer (fir'îr), n. One who sets fire to anything; an incendiary.

fire-raft (fir'râft), n. A raft loaded with combustibles, set on fire, and directed against an enemy's ship or fleet.

Then the fire-raft was pushed alongside, and in a moment the ship was one blaze.

P. G. Farragut, quoted in N. Y. Tribune, May 10, 1862.

fire-raising (fir'râ'zing), n. The act of setting on fire. In Scots law, fire-raising is the technical equivalent of arson in English law. See arson.

"But we'll see if the red cock craw not in his bonnie barn-yard as morning before day-dawning."

"Hush! Meg, hush! hush! that's not safe talk."

"What does she mean?" said Mannerling to Sampson, in an undertone.

"Fire-raising," answered the laconic Dominie.

Scott, Guy Mannerling, iii.

fire-red (fir'red), a. [< ME. fyrrred (= OHG. fyrrrät, G. feuerroth), < fyrr, fire, + reed, red.] Red as fire.

A sumpson was ther with us in that place,
That hadde a fyrrred cherubyns face.

Chaucer, Gen. Prof. of C. T., l. 624.

fire-regulator (fir'reg'û-lâ-tôr), n. An automatic device employed with low-pressure steam-heating furnaces to maintain a uniform temperature. It consists essentially of an expanding valve, which opens when the steam reaches a certain pressure, lifting a lever which in turn controls a damper in the chimney.

The closing of the damper checks the fire, when the pressure falls and the damper-opens again, the process being continually repeated, and thus maintaining the temperature within certain limits.

fire-roll (fir'rol), n. Naut., a peculiar bent of the drum to order men to their stations on an alarm of fire; a summons to fire-quarters; in the United States navy, the rapid ringing of the ship's bell as an alarm-signal of fire.

fire-room (fir'rûm), n. A room or space in front of the furnaces or steam-boilers on a ship, devoted to the management of the boilers and the supply of the furnaces with coal. Also called stoke-hole.

fire-screen (fir'skrën), n. 1. A kind of movable screen placed before a fire to intercept the heat. Specifically: (a) A standing frame supporting a surface of painted work, textile fabric, or glass, the last of which allows the fire to be seen, while keeping off the heat. (b) A piece of stuff hanging from the edge of the mantelpiece or from a bracket or an arm, generally of light metal-work. (c) A screen, not unlike a fan, small enough to hold in the hand.

2. A woollen screen placed in the passageway from a powder-magazine whenever this is opened.

fire-set (fir'set), n. A set of fire-irons, usually comprising shovel, poker, and tongs, with the holder. The holder consists generally of a metal rod with arms or a ring, fixed at the foot in a solid block or tile.

fire-setting (fir'set-ing), n. Excavation in a mine with the preliminary aid of a fire built against the working-face. Now almost an obsolete process, but before the application of gunpowder to mining purposes a method of the greatest importance. The rock, after being highly heated, is rapidly cooled by throwing cold water on it, by which it is so much cracked that it can be broken down by pick and gad.

fire-shield (fir'shöld), n. A sheet-metal guard used to protect workmen at a furnace or firemen at a fire from the heat. In an improved form two sheets of corrugated iron are riveted together at the edges, and connected at the top with a hose bringing water under pressure. The water fills the screen and escapes below. Hung on an elevated track before a furnace-door or suspended from a crane, it serves to absorb the heat from the furnace, and to keep the fire-room cool. When not required, it is rolled aside or lifted by the crane.

fire-ship (fir'ship), n. A vessel freighted with combustibles and explosives and set adrift, for the purpose of burning or blowing up an enemy's ships, a bridge, or other object.

fire-shovel (fir'shuv'l), n. [ME. not found; < AS. fyrscop (in a gloss), < fyr, fire, + scop, shovel.] A shovel for lifting or removing coals of fire or ashes, or for placing coals on a fire.

Nym and Randolph are sworn brothers in fiction, and in Calais they stole a fire-shovel: I knew, by that piece of service, the men would carry coals. Shak., Hen. V., iii. 2.

fireside (fir'sid), n. and a. 1. n. The side of the fireplace; the hearth; the space about a fire or hearth, considered especially as the place where a family gathers for social enjoyment.

There is no fireside, howsoever defended,
But has one vacant chair.

Longfellow, Resignation.

How often shall her old fireside

Be cheer'd with tidings of the bride.

Tennyson, In Memoriam, xl.

For the winter fireside meet,

Between the andirons' straddling feet,

The mug of cider simmered slow.

Whittier, Snow-Bound.

II. a. Fitted for the fireside; homely; intimate.

In a letter to Southey, Lamb says of Hunt, "He is one of the most cordial-minded men I ever knew, and matches as a fireside companion."

Personal Traits of British Authors, p. 226.

No higher compliment was ever paid to a nation than the simple confidence, the fireside plainness, with which Mr. Lincoln always addresses himself to the nation of the American people. Lowell, Study Windows, p. 174.

fire-silvering (fir'sil'ver-ing), n. A method of silvering either by the use of a silver amalgam or by thoroughly cleansing the surface of the metal and then applying a mixture of spongy precipitated metallic silver, sal ammoniac, salt, and corrosive sublimate, and finally heating in a muffle.

firesmo (fi-res'mō), n. A little-used mnemonic name for the mode of syllogism called festino. The name firesmo implies that the premises are transposed.

fire-spirit (fir'spir'it), n. The spirit or deity supposed in some systems of religion to be the animating principle of fire; fire personified.

The Fire-spirit has great influence with the winged aerial supreme deity, wherefore the Indians implore him to be their interpreter, to procure them success in hunting and fishing, fleet horses, obedient wives, and male children. E. B. Tylor, Prim. Culture, II. 253.

fire-spot (fir'spot), n. In archæol., a bowl-shaped hollow in the earth, partly filled with ashes, calcined bones, etc., and apparently used as a fireplace. By some, fire-spots are thought to be the vestiges of funeral pyres. They are common in the north of Europe, especially in Scandinavian countries.

fire-steel (fir'stēl), n. [(= D. vuurstaal = G. feuerstahl = Dan. fyrstaal) < fire + steel. Cf. fire-iron.] A steel used with a flint for striking fire.

A fire-steel wherewith to strike fire out of a flint.

Nomenclator (1855).

fire-stick (fir'stik), n. [Cf. Dan. fyrstik, fyrstikke, a match.] 1. A lighted stick or brand. Sir K. Digby.—2. The implement used in various parts of the world for obtaining fire by friction, or rubbing of one stick against another, either with the hands simply or with the aid of the drill.

When the use of pyrites for striking fire is found existing in company with it in North America, it is at least likely that the fire-stick is the older instrument.

E. B. Tylor, Early History of Mankind, p. 262.

fire-stone (fir'ston), n. [< ME. fyrgrstōn, < AS. fyrstān (= OD. fuertstōn, D. vuursteen = MĀG. vuursten, LĀ. fuertstēn = G. feuerstein = Dan. fyrstēn), flint, < fyr, fire, + stān, stone.] 1. A flint used with a steel for striking fire.

A fire-stone to strike fire with, silex.

Withals, Ihet, (ed. 1608), p. 206.

2†. Iron pyrites: so called because it strikes fire with steel. See pyrites.—3. A stone which resists the action of fire; especially, a kind of sandstone used in fireplaces: same as maut-rock.—4. An incendiary composition employed to set fire to ships, buildings, etc. It is made of niter, sulphur, antimony, and resin, mixed with melted tallow and turpentine. The melted mixture is cast in paper molds and primed with a fuse. For use it is charged in shell together with a bursting-charge.

fire-surface (fir'sēr fās), n. In steam-boilers, the aggregate surface of the boiler exposed to the action of the fire. Also called heating-surface.

fire-swab (fir'swob), n. A swab of rope-yarns, saturated with water during action, and used to extinguish any particles of fire; the rammer and sponge-heads.

firetail (fir'tāl), n. 1. A hymenopterous insect of the family Chrysididae, such as the ruby-tailed fly, Chrysis ignita.—2. The redstart or redtail, Ruticilla phænicea, a bird. Also fire-flirt. [Local, Eng.]

fire-telegraph (fir'tēl ē-grāf), n. A telegraph to announce the outbreak of fire to different parts of a city, by means of signal-boxes placed at convenient points.

fire-tower (fir'tōw ēr), n. [Cf. D. vuurtoren = G. feuerturm (rare) = Dan. fjrtårn = Sw. fjrtorn, a lighthouse.] 1. An erection with an iron vessel on its top for holding fire or a flame, answering the purpose of a lighthouse.—2. A tower from which to watch for the outbreak of fire in a city, and to give the alarm by the ringing of a bell: now generally superseded by the fire-telegraph.

fire-trap (fir'trap), n. A place or building specially combustible, in which life is greatly exposed to destruction by fire.

While searching for fire-traps among the theaters, why not take a look at the churches and school-houses?

Waterbury (Conn.) Weekly American, Dec. 23, 1881.

fire-tree (fir'trē), n. In bot.: (a) Same as flame-tree, 1. (b) In New Zealand, the Mitrosideros tomentosa, a large myrtaceous tree with brilliant flowers.

fire-tube (fir'tūb), n. In steam-engines, a furnace-tube through which the flame and heated air pass from the fire-chamber: a pipe-flue.

fire-ward, fire-warden (fir'wārd, -wār dā), n. An officer having authority in the prevention or extinguishing of fires, as in towns or camps.

fire-water (fir'wā tēr), n. Ardent spirits: a name used by American Indians.

The blood of chiefs is in my veins, where it must stay forever. The Dutch landed, and gave my people the fire-water; they drank until the heavens and the earth seemed to meet, and they foolishly thought they had found the Great Spirit.

J. F. Cooper, Last of Mohicans, in.

From Sagamore Bonvillon's hunting flask

The fire-water burns at the lip of Megone.

Whittier, Mozz Megone, i.

fire-weapon (fir'wep n), n. Same as firearm.

J. Bingham, Tactics of Aelian, 1616.

fireweed (fir'wēd), n. In bot.: (a) The Erichthites hieracifolia, a coarse annual composite of North America, so called from its appearing abundantly where clearings have recently been burned over. (b) The great willow-herb, Epilobium angustifolium, for the same reason. (c) The horseweed, Erigeron Canadensis. (d) A species of plantain, Plantago media.

fire-wood (fir'wūd), n. Wood for fuel.

In haste they drove . . . and heaped

Their firewood, and the wind-fan off the plain

Roll'd the rich vapour far into the heaven.

Tennyson, Idyll, viii. 548.

firework (fir'wōrk), n. [= D. vuurwerk = G. Feuerwerk; cf. Dan. fjrværker = Sw. fjrvärkeri (def. 2).] 1†. Work wrought in the fire. Darics.

His heart the amule whereon the dull frames his fire-works.

Brown, A Murriner, p. 10.

2. A contrivance of inflammable and explosive materials combined in various proportions, for the purpose of producing in combustion beautiful or amusing scenic effects, or to be used as a night signal on land or sea, or for various purposes in war: commonly used in the plural. The basis of these compositions consists of potassium chlorate, niter, sulphur, and charcoal, pulverized, and combined in different proportions with other agents which have the quality of imparting color to the flames (as with copper sulphate for blue, strontium nitrate or carbonate for red, potassium salts for violet, sodium salts for yellow, barium carbonate or nitrate for green), and with iron and steel filings to produce brilliant scintillations. These compositions are packed in cases of paper and pasteboard, generally cylindrical, the process of packing and finishing demanding much skill and care. For scenic displays, the forms of fireworks most in use are the fixed jets, such as theater-fires, lances, and geyers; ascending jets, as pin- or catharine-wheels, spiral wheels, etc.; ascending jets, as sky-rockets and granddrolls; Roman candles; etc. As night signals or as incendiary projectiles, various pyrotechnic devices have been employed with success in military and naval operations. These devices consist of preparations used (1) in the service of cannon or cannon-ammunition, such as slow-match, quick-match, friction, electric, and obdurate primers, port-fires, and fuses; (2) for signals, such as signal rockets, signal lights, blue-lights, etc., with their decorations consisting of stars, serpents, gold rain, rain of fire, and maroons; (3) for incendiary purposes, as the carcass, incendiary match and fire-stone; (4) for light, as tarred links, torches, light balls, fire-balls, patched basins, and parachute shells; (5) for offensive and defensive purposes, as bags of powder, petards, projectile rockets, as those of Congreve and Hale, light barrels, and dynamite or nitroglycerin cartridges. The most familiar of the many forms of fireworks is the sky rocket, whether employed as a signal or for mere display, or as a projectile in war. An important use of the rocket is that of a line-carrier to establish communication between a wrecked vessel and the shore.

The Chinese, if not the actual inventors of fireworks, were the first to use the rocket as a missile in war and the pyrotechnic exhibitions of the Chinese and Japanese still surpass those of all other peoples in magnificence and splendor. The Japanese have contrived an exhibition of fireworks by daylight, consisting of bombs which, exploding high in air, discharge jets or volumes of colored smoke which take the forms of birds, fishes, trees, and even of human beings. Fireworks are supposed to have been introduced into Europe by the Italians. They are mentioned in a description of a pageant at the marriage of Henry VIII. and Anne Boleyn.

The king would have me present the princess . . . with some delightful ostentation, or show, or pageant, or antic, or firework.

Shak., I. I. i. v. 1.

All the hammocks were taken down, our ordnance loaded, and our powder-chests and fireworks made ready.

Winthrop, Hist. New England, I. 7.

There was at night a show of very strange and sundry kinds of fireworks, compelled by cunning to fly to and fro, and to mount very high into the air upward, and also to burn unquenchable in the water beneath.

Lauchlin, quoted in Strutt's Sports and Pastimes, p. 180.

fire-worker (fir'wēr kēr), n. [= Dan. fjrværker = Sw. fjrværkare.] An officer of artillery, subordinate to the fire-master: now called second lieutenant.

Fire-workers are subordinate officers to the fire-masters, who command the bombardiers. They receive the orders from the fire-masters, and see that the bombardiers execute them.

Chambers's Cyc. (London, 1741), quoted in N. and Q., 7th ser., III. 479.

Fire-worker of H. M. Office of Ordnance.

N. and Q., 7th ser., III. 429.

fire-worm (fir'wōrm), n. [= MĀG. vuurworm = G. feurworm.] A glow-worm.

I have seen the fireflies and fire-worms.

fire-worship (fir'wēr ship), n. The worship of fire, or of the god of fire, or of the divine as typified by fire; also, the ceremonial cult of a public or a family hearth, as practised, for instance, by all Aryan peoples, by all ancient Greek communities, by the vestal virgins of Rome, and in each ancient Greek and Roman family. The term fire-worship, as specifically applied to the religion of the ancient Persians taught by Zoroaster, and practised by their descendants, the Guebres and Parsis of Persia and India, as it taken literally a misnomer derived from the Mohammedans the fire being with these peoples merely a symbol of divinity and a visible sign of their religion. See Guebres and Parsis.

Fire-worship brings into view again, though under different aspects and with different results, the problems presented by water-worship. The real and absolute worship of fire falls into great divisions, the first belonging rather to fetishism, the second to polytheism proper, and the two apparently representing an earlier and later stage of theological ideas. E. B. Tylor, Prim. Culture II. 251.

After vanquishing Moab and Ammon, both nations addicted to fire-worship, he David showed notice of mercy towards them. See Bible, Psalm, Hist. (trans.) p. 47.

fire-worshiper (fir'wēr ship-ēr), n. A worshiper of fire; specifically, a follower of Zoroaster. See Guebres and Parsis.

There has been an error in imagining that the Persians and the ancient fire-worshipers were idolaters in the sense of the word, in bowing down before it, they simply regarded fire as a symbol, or visible sign, or thing placed as standing for Deity. See J. J. Rostkowski, Rostkowski, p. 70.

The so-called Fire-worshipers certainly do not worship the fire, and they naturally object to a name which seems to place them on a level with mere idolaters.

Max Müller, Chips, I. 169.

When he was seven years old, all the kindred of his father's house, and all the friends thereof, assembled in the inner temple to see the high-priest invest him with the symbolic garment of the fire-worshiper: "the garment of the good and beneficial way."

J. W. Palmer, The New and the Old, p. 273.

fir-in-bond (fēr'in-bond'), n. [fir, taken in a general sense; in bond; see bond], n. In carpentry, lintels, bond-timbers, wall-plates, and all timbers built in walls. See bond, 12.

fring (fīr'ing), n. [Verbal n. of fire, v.] 1. The act of applying fire or of making a fire for any purpose; specifically, the method of treating a furnace with regard to the use of fuel: as, hard fring (supplying fuel frequently and urging the fire; light fring (moderate supplies of fuel at frequent intervals); steady fring; heavy fring.—2. Fuel; fire-wood or coal.

And in some places they burne it (rubarb) in stead of other; and thus they their horses to eat.

Purchas, Pilgrimage, p. 425.

No more dams I'll make for fish,

Nor fetch in fring

At requiring. Shak., Tempest, ii. 2.

You would have a load of wood for fring on All Saints or Christmas.

Mrs. Gaskell, Sylvia's Lovers, xli.

3. The exposing of any material to high temperatures to burn, bake, etc.; as, the fring of painted glass to fix the colors; the fring of porcelain to melt and fix the glaze.

When the "withering" is finished, then follows the fring. The test is placed in metal pans set in a brickwork furnace, heated to a temperature of 240 or 250; the leaves are turned incessantly . . . to prevent their burning; . . . they are then removed, . . . thrown on tables, and rolled and sifted while hot.

A. G. F. Eliot-Jones, Indian Industries, p. 345.

4. The act of discharging firearms.

After loading, the block is depressed and kept in position for fring by a spring catch working under the barrel.

W. W. Greene, The Gun, p. 91.

5. The application of fire or of a caustery in surgery and farriery; cauterization.

A blow on the sinew is generally the cause of a long period of lameness, and fring may be needed.

Engel, Brit., xli. 195.

6. In bell-ringing, the ringing of all the bells in a peal at once. It is practised in England on occasions of general rejoicing or mourning. In the latter case the bells are muffled. Mechanical firing, the operation of supplying fuel to a furnace by means of a mechanical attachment.

fring-iron (fīr'ing-i ērn), n. An instrument used in farriery for cauterizing; a caustery.

fring-machine (fīr'ing-mā-shēn'), n. In mech., an apparatus for feeding an engine-furnace with coal.

fring-party (fīr'ing-pār tī), n. A detachment of soldiers, marines, or sailors detailed to fire over the grave of a person buried with military honors, or to execute any person sentenced to death by shooting.

fring-point (fīr'ing-point), n. The temperature at which an inflammable oil or hydrocarbon is liable to take fire spontaneously.

Mineral oil, one or two degrees above the standard fring-point, may, if stored in a populous locality, cause sad disaster.

Enc. Brit., xiv. 570.

firk (fēr'k), v. [Also written, more prop., firk, < ME. firk, rarely ficken, carry, take, or drive off, refl. take oneself off, intr. go away, hasten, < AS. fircan (once), bring or take away, prob. not connected with ferean, ge-ferean (each once), sustain, support (with food). Cf. G. dial. (Swabian, Swiss) ferean, feygan, feyken, feyken, bring, despatch.] 1. firas, 1. To carry away or about; carry; move.

Sachet was his body, that burthen hale yonghe
The lute of that tricks to firk him aboute.

Out of my eyes, the light of his strong charge.

De Witt, Journal of Travels (L. E. T. S.), i. 359.

2. To drive away.

That werned him firk—

That by force of his right he firked him thence.

Alcander of Marston (L. E. T. S.), i. 167.

3. To beat; drub; trounce.

They . . . firked the folk.

With kettles, the skomyl skape therie night.

Alcander of Marston (L. E. T. S.), i. 185.

I will firk your father, whether you will or no.

Chapman, All Fools, iii. 1.

I shall have

The warden to be firked nobody.

Middleton, Game at Che, i. 1.

And firk him, and firk him.

Shak., Hamlet, iv. 4.

4. To carry; put; cup.

His feet, and firked down on a fine

Of the firk of the firk.

Reynolds, French Lawyer, i. 1.

I have also spent Christmas Day in India, but not all the marionades of Cathay will firk up Christmas spirits, or make me throw crumbs to a blue-jay.

P. Robinson, Under the Sun, p. 98.

II. intrins. To move quickly; go off or fly out suddenly; sometimes used reflexively.

firk to the far-lande, and fetehe me that wapene.

Morte Arthure (E. E. T. S.), i. 1188.

How would he firk, like Adam Overdo,

Up and about; dive into cellars too.

B. Jonson, Expost, with Hugo Jones.

firk (fēr'k), n. [firk, v.] A stroke; a lash. [Prov. Eng.]

firk (fēr'k), n. [Prob. a transposition of freak, q. v.] A freak; a trick. [Prov. Eng.]

Out on him!

These are his megrims, firks, and melancholies.

Ford, Broken Heart, iii. 1.

Sir, leave this firk of law, or, by this light,

I'll give your throat a shut.

4. Fixed in character; stable; enduring; established; steadfast; staunch; as, firm credit; firm prices; a firm friend; a firm conviction.

My affianced and my faith is firm in this belief.

Piers Plowman (B), xvi. 238.

All the presidents of the kingdom . . . have consulted together . . . to make a firm decree.

Dan. vi. 7.

A man firm and standing in his purposes, nor heau'd off with each wind and passion.

Bp. Earle, Micro-cosmographie, A Stayed Man.

O! shame to men! devil with devil damn'd

Firm concord holds; men only disagree

Of creatures rational. Milton, P. L., ii. 497.

5. Strong in action or manner; resolute; positive; confident; as, a firm defense or resistance; a firm answer; the firm handling of a subject in art or literature.

So unaffected, so composed a mind;

So firm, yet soft; so strong, yet so refined.

Pope, Epitaph on Mrs. Corbet.

6. Indicating firmness; as, a firm countenance or demeanor.—7. Determined; positive; distinctly stated.

There is no firm reason to be render'd

Why he cannot abide a gaping pig.

Shak., M. of V., iv. 1.

= Syn. 1. Dense.—2. Fast, established, secure.—2 and 4. Immovable, staunch, strong, sturdy.

firm (fēr'm), v. t. [firk, v.] 1. To make firm; give consistence to.

The powder that made Venus a goddess, . . . that kept her perpetually young, cleared her wrinkles, firmed her gums, filled her skin, coloured her hair.

B. Jonson, Volpone, ii. 1.

The force of the water . . . did firm and harden it (land).

North, tr. of Plutarch, p. 85.

2. To fix; establish; confirm.

Your wish is best.

Love knocks his chin against his breast,

And firms it with the rest.

B. Jonson, Masque of Augurs.

3. To fix or direct with firmness.

Upon his card and compass firms his eye.

Spenser, F. Q., ii. vii. 1.

4. To confirm by signing; make valid by subscription or indorsement.

For lacke of time the generous haue not firmed this letter.

Of the death of the Emperour they advertised Solymán, firmit those letters with all their hands and seals.

Kudles, Hist. Turks.

firm (fēr'm), n. [From the adj.; in defs. 2, 3, a special use, = It. Sp. firma, < ML. firma, signa- ture, subscription, in confirmation of a writing; see firma, a. Cf. firma, 14. The firm land; terra firma; in general, the mainland.

No such Islands may be found in the Scithian sea toward the firm of Asia.

Hakluyt's Voyages, I. 438.

And to the North, betwixt the fore-land and the firm, She (Wight) hath that narrow Sea, which we the Solent term.

Drayton, Polyolbion, ii. 407.

Towards evening we went ashore on the firm of Asia for fresh water.

Sandys, Travailes, p. 15.

24. A sign manual; a signature.

A privilege [was] given to Anthemius the Archbishop [of Cyprus] in that age, to subscribe his name to all public acts in red letters, which was an honour above that of any patriarch, who writes his name or firma in black characters.

Riquart, Greek and Armenian Churches, p. 90.

3. A partnership or association of two or more persons for carrying on a business; a commercial house; a concern; also, the name or title under which associated parties transact business; as, the firm of Hope & Co. The name of one only of the partners may be taken as the firm name; as, the firm of Thomas Jones. If, however, only one person is interested in the business, there is no partnership firm, even though he should use a fictitious addition to make the concern seem one. Present statutes in several jurisdictions forbid the use of firm names where there is no firm, saying, however, the right, under proper restrictions, of foreign houses, and of continued use of an established name notwithstanding dissolution of the firm if originally represented.

Round these halls a thousand baby loves firmament (fēr'ma-mēnt), n. [firk, v.] 1. The firmament (also translated fastness, q. v.) = B. G. Dan. Sw. firment, < OE. firment, F. firment = Pr. firment = Sp. firment = It. firment, a strengthening, support, prop. in L. (Vulgate) the firmament (tr. Gr. στέφανος, Heb. ru'ia; see note to def. 2), ⟨firmare, make strong, strengthen: see firm, v.⟩

1†. Foundation; support; basis.

The law is the law of sin, custom is the sanction or the firmament of the law.
Jos. Taylor, Works (ed. 1830), I, 726.

2. The sky or heavens; the vault of heaven, viewed as something solid and abiding; the region of the air. [The Hebrew word raqia, which is so rendered in Scripture, conveys chiefly the idea of expansion, although that of solidity is also suggested, inasmuch as the root signification of the word is "that which is expanded by beating out." The English firmament is adopted from the Latin firmamentum, which is the equivalent of the Greek ἀρεπμα (arepma, firm, solid), by which the writers of the Septuagint rendered raqia. Some old astronomers identified the firmament with the orb of the fixed stars; but the word never had any settled and exact meaning in astronomy.]

For these 2 ben the greatest Lordes under the Firmament.
Mundeville, Travels, p. 272.

And God said, Let there be a firmament in the midst of the waters, and let it divide the waters from the waters. And God made the firmament and divided the waters which were under the firmament from the waters which were above the firmament.
Gen. i, 6, 7.

On flaky wings it mounts, and quick as light Cuts thro' the yielding Air, with Rays of Light;
 'Till the blue Firmament at last it gains.

Congreve, Death of Queen Mary.

3. A piece of jewelry, as a star or the like, meant to be worn in a head-dress, such as the commode or tower of the seventeenth century.
firmamental (fēr-ma-men'tal), a. [⟨firmament + -al.] Pertaining to the firmament; celestial; being of the upper regions.

An hollow crystal pyramid he takes,
 In firmamental waters dipt above.

Dryden, Annus Mirabilis, l. 1122.

firman (fēr'man or fēr-mān'), n. [Also written firmann, phirman, phirmann, firmann, etc., repr. Turk. fermān = Ar. Hind. farmān, < Pers. farmān, a mandate, order, command, patent, = Skt. pramāna, a measure, scale, authority, decision, < pra- (= Pers. far- = Gr. προς, etc.) + √ mā, measure, < -ana.] A decree or edict of an Oriental sovereign, as of Turkey, issued for various special purposes, as to provide protection and assistance for a traveler, or to sanction an enterprise and prescribe its conditions; a passport; a permit; a license; a grant.

The firmān for importing rice and coffee from Egypt is in the hands of some merchants here [at Balas].

Pococke, Description of the East, II, i, 175.

After sitting down about two minutes, I again got up, and stood in the middle of the room before him, saying, I am bearer of a hātsherrif, or royal mandate, to you, Mahomet Aga! and took the firmān out of my bosom, and presented it to him.
Bruce, Source of the Nile, I, 152.

The difference between a Firman and a Hatti Sherif is that, though both are edicts of the Turkish government, the former is signed by any Minister, whereas the latter is approved by the Sultan himself, with his special mark, and is therefore supposed to be irrevocable. The distinction is as real as between a love-letter and a marriage settlement.
Blackwood's Mag.

The Sultan granted a firmān . . . allowing the members of each sect to put to death any person belonging to the other sect who should be found inside of their churches or synagogues.
B. Taylor, Lands of the Saracen, p. 80.

firmary¹ (fēr'mā-ri), n. [⟨ML. firmare, sign, confirm.⟩] The right of a tenant to his lands and tenements.

firmary² (fēr'mā-ri), n. Same as firmery, ultimately infirmery.

Infirmary, or the Firmarie (the Curator whereof Infirmarys), wherein persons downright sick (trouble to others, and troubled by others, if lodging in the dormitories) had the benefit of physick, and attendance private to themselves.
Kupper, Ch. Hist., VI, 286.

firmation (fēr-mā'shon), n. [⟨ML. firmatio(n)-, confirmation, assurance, etc., taken in its lit. sense, < L. firmare, strengthen, make fast: see firm, v.⟩] A fixing or steadying.

It is also true that man only sitteth, if we define sitting to be a firmation of the body upon the ischias.
Sic T. Browne, Vulg. Err., iv, 1.

Thy covenant implies no less than firmitude and perpetuity.
Eph. Hall, Cases of Conscience, iv, 2.

In most delicious drops did fall
 Down to the floor heart-melting Tears, and yield
 A pearly pavement, which the ground's cool kiss Into chaste Firmitude did crystallize.

J. Barrow, Psyche, iii, 12.

firmity (fēr'mi-ti), n. [⟨OF. fermete, F. ferme = It. fermate, validity, < L. firmatus(-s), < firmus, firm.]. Firmness; strength.

The square is of all other accepted the figure of most soliditie and stedfastnesse, and for his owne staye and firmity requireth none other base then himselfe.
Puffendorf, Arte of Eng. Poetrie, p. 83.

The strength and firmity of my assent must rise and fall together with the apparent credibility of the object.
Chaltenham, Religion of Protestants, i, 6.

firmless (fēr'm'les), a. [⟨firm + -less.] Wavering; shifting; unsteady.

Past the Red sea, heer yd and down we float,
 On firmless sands of this vast Desert heer.

Sylvestre, tr. of Du Bartas Weeks, n. The Lawe

Does passion still the firmless mind control? Pope.

firmly (fēr'm'li), adv. In a firm manner; solidly; compactly; strongly; steadily; with constancy or fixedness; steadfastly; resolutely; immovably; as, particles of matter firmly cohering; he firmly believes in fatalism; his resolution is firmly fixed.

And so incessantly continued all that night, in so muche where we had out of us, ameres they held not firmly, but rasid and dragged by sydenne of that outrageous storme.
Sir R. Guylford, Pylygrynage, p. 61.

His breastplate first, that was of substance pure,
 Before his noble heart he firmly bound.

Spenser, Muirpothues, l. 57.

I falter where I firmly trod.

Longman, In Memoriam, iv.

While he entertained us, with the most lavish generosity, he firmly, though courteously, refused the half dozen pieces of silver which I offered him.

O'Donovan, Merv, xviii.

firm-name (fēr'm'nām), n. The name or title of a firm in business.

firmness (fēr'm'nes), n. [⟨firm + -ness.] 1. The state or quality of being firm; compactness; hardness; solidity; stability; strength; steadfastness; resoluteness; constancy; fixedness; certainty; as, the firmness of jelly; firmness of flesh; firmness of union; the firmness of a purpose; the firmness of a judge.

And in the steady resting of the ground
 Your noble firmness to your friend is bound;

For you are still the same, and where you love,
 No absence can your constant mind remove.

Beaumont, To the Prince.

A weak mind would have sunk under such a load of unpopularity [as Fox had]. But that resolute spirit seemed to derive new firmness from the public hatred.
Macaulay, Lord Holland.

2. In physiol., an organ situated toward the back part of the head, between self-esteem and veneration. Its function is said to be to produce determination, constancy, and perseverance.
 — Syn. 1. Firmness, Constancy, Faithfulness, Fidelity. Firmness is a matter of the will, preventing one from yielding; constancy, of the heart, holding one steadfast. Firmness is opposed to weakness or pliancy; constancy to fickleness. Faithfulness is a matter of the heart; it is generally a warmer sort of adherere, with the element of principle sometimes less prominent. Fidelity is a matter of personal principle; the word more often than the others applies to definite action. We speak of the firmness of a teacher in maintaining order, the constancy of a lover, the adherere of a bank cashier, the faithfulness of a mother. We may speak of the adherere of a dog only as he meets trusts imposed in him, or is considered as having the power to apply principle to action as a moral being. See determination and assiduity.

She now took her place among her pupils with an air of spirit and firmness which assured them at once that she meant to be obeyed, and obeyed she was.
Charlotte Brontë, The Professor, xviii.

Without constancy there is neither love, friend-ship, nor virtue in the world.

Pathfulness can feed on suffering.

And knows no disappointment.

George Eliot, Spanish Gypsy, i.

No man can mortgage his injustice as a pawn for his adherere.
Riches, Ray in France.

firn (firn or fēr'n), n. [G. dial. (Swiss), also firne, a glacier, accumulated snow, lit. last year's snow; < G. firn, a., last year's, of the last year, < OHG. firn, old, ancient: see *fern*².] A name given to snow accumulated in the highest parts of mountain ranges on which glaciers occur, while such snow is in a granular condition, and before, in its downward movement, it has been fully consolidated into ice. Such snow is called by the French neige. Both words are in common use among writers on Alpine geology and mountaineering generally.

The imperfectly consolidated substance, partly snow and partly ice, is known in Switzerland as neige or firn.
Hazlett, Physiography, p. 155.

Pirola (fir'ō-lä), n. [NL.] The typical genus of heteropods of the family Pirolidae, having no shell, no tentacles in either sex, and a pinnate tail; same as Pleurobrachion. Braguere, 1792.

Lamb, Two Races of Men.

It had been decided to forbid the Prince bread, water, fire, and shelter; to give his wealth to the fisc, his heart to the assassin.

Mallet, Dutch Republic, III. 494.

It is (the United States government's) proper business as a fisc is to receive the people's revenue from taxes in good money which it has coined for them.

Report of Sec. of Treasury, 1886, I. xxxvi.

fiscal (fîs'kal), a. and n. [= D. fiskaal = Dan. Sw. fiskal, < F. fiscal = Pr. Sp. Pg. fiscal = It. fiscale, < LL. fiscalis, of or belonging to the state treasury, < fiscus, the state treasury: see fisc.]

I. a. 1. Of or pertaining to the public treasury or revenue; relating to or concerned with the collection and expenditure of taxes and customs; pertaining to the financial operations of a government.

Whatever amount is taken from the community in the form of taxes, if not lost, goes to them in the shape of expenditures or disbursements. The two—disbursement and taxation—constitute the fiscal action of the government.

Cathoun, Works, I. 19.

In the taxes imposed by the Parliamentary ordinances we find the germs of our subsequent fiscal system.

S. Dawell, Taxes in England, II. 4.

Hence—2. Of or pertaining to financial matters in general; as, a fiscal agent. Fiscal lands, among the Franks, lands set apart to form a fund which might support the dignity of the king, and supply him with the means of rewarding merit and encouraging valor. These, under the name of benefices, were granted to favored subjects, upon the condition that the grantees should render to the king personal service in the field. Fiscal year, the financial year of the treasury of a government; hence, the period at the end of which the accounts of any public office or treasury, or of any business enterprise or firm, etc., are made up, and the books balanced.

During the fiscal year ending June 30, 1884, the total expense of the Diplomatic and Consular service was nominally $1,288,355.28. E. Schuyler, Amer. Diplomacy, p. 17.

II. n. 1. Revenue; the income of a sovereign or state.

War cannot be long maintained by the ordinary fiscal and receipt. Bacon.

2. In some countries, a treasurer or minister of finance.—3. In Spain and Portugal, the king's solicitor or attorney-general.

The fiscal is of an active, enterprising genius.

H. Steindurff, Travels through Spain, xlv.

4. A public prosecutor. In Scotland he is also called procurator-fiscal. In the Dutch colonies in America the officer who acted as sheriff and public prosecutor and carried out the customs regulations of the Dutch West India Company was called a fiscal, or schout fiscal (fiscal sheriff). Our guardian-angel shall then be fiscal and accuser, calling for Divine justice against us.

Jer. Taylor, Works (ed. 1855), I, 329.

I dimma ken what's to be the upshot o' this, and I'm no going to be cross-questioned before the Fisc.

W. Black, In Far Lochaber, xv.

In this sense the word has been and is still largely used as the equivalent of the former extensive class Pisces, including the leptocephalians, myxozoids, and selachians, as well as true Pisces. But the differences between these several types of structure are so great that the leptocephalians and myxozoids have been each contrasted with all remaining vertebrates.

"Trewlie," quath the frere, "a fol y the holde! Thon woldest not weten thy fote & woldest fish kachen."

Piers Plowman's Creed (E. E. T. S.), I, 405.

3d Fish. Master, I marvel how the fishes live in the sea.

1st Fish. Why, as men do a-land; the great ones eat up the little ones.

Shak., Pericles, ii, 1.

The fish was adopted by the early Church as its sacred symbol because the Greek word for fish, which contains the initial letters of the name and titles of Christ, contains also the initial letters of some prophetic lines ascribed to the Sibyl of Erythra.

Locky, Europ. Morals, I, 100.

2. In zool.: (a) Any branchiferous vertebrate with a complete cranium and a lyriiform shoulder-girdle. In this sense, the leptocephalians and myxozoids are excluded, but the selachians are included with true Pisces. (b) A branchiferous or teleostomous vertebrate with dermal plates or membrane-bones superadded to the primordial cranium and shoulder-girdle, and with the branchiae free outwardly. The sturgeons as well as all the osseous fishes are included in the group thus defined.—3. In popular language, any animal that lives entirely in the water; a swimming as distinguished from a flying or walking animal, including cetaceous mammals, batrachians, mollusks, crustaceans, and echinoderms, as well as fishes proper: commonly distinguished by some specifying word, as blackfish, shellfish, starfish. See these and other compounds.

A common fishery is the right of fishing in the sea and public rivers open to all the public.
Encyc. Brit., IX, 268.

3. A place where fish are regularly caught, or other products of the sea or rivers are taken from the water by fishing, diving, dredging, etc.; as, a salmon-fishery; a pearl-fishery; the fisheries of the coast.

In one of the large fisheries at Rivière Ouelle, 3000 eels, averaging two pounds, have been taken in one tide.
Harpes's Map, LXXVII, 825.

Bay-fishery, the act or industry of fishing in a bay; specifically, the mackerel fishery of the gulf of St. Lawrence. Coast-fishery, fishery conducted within three marine miles from the shore line, or inside a three-mile limit. When the fishery is pursued from the shore, but with the use of open boats, as in the taking of mackerel, herring, and especially caplin, smelt, and lance, it is a strand fishery. Ind. Commissioner of Fish and Fisheries. See commissioner. Common of fishery, the right of fishing "in another man's water": like common of pasture, etc.
Encyc. Brit., IX, 268. Fishery society, a society organized for the protection, promotion, and encouragement of the industry of fishing.—Fishery treaties, treaties concerning fisheries; specifically, the treaties between the United States and Great Britain defining the privileges of fishermen who are citizens of the United States in the waters of British North America. By the treaty of 1783 with Great Britain extensive privileges were granted to American fishermen in the waters of British North America. These privileges were materially lessened by the treaty of 1818, which gave rise to the vexed questions whether the "three mile limit" from the shore should be run parallel to the shore or from headland to headland, and relating to the rights of American ships in Canadian ports. On the fishery question the relations between the two countries continued to be unsatisfactory, in spite of various attempts at solution, as in the treaty of Washington in 1871 and the proposed treaty of 1888.—Free fishery, an exclusive right of fishing in public water, derived from royal grant.
Encyc. Brit., IX, 268. Several fishery, the exclusive right of fishery of an individual, derived through or on account of ownership of the soil.
Encyc. Brit., IX, 268. Strand-fishery. See coast-fishery. United States Commission of Fish and Fisheries. See commission.

Bony fishing, the menhaden-fishery. [Slang.]

Reef-fishing, fishing on or from coral reefs. [Florida, U. S.]

Rip-fishing, fishing in ripples or tide tips, as for pollack. For this purpose the vessel is kept under easy sail, the lines being attached to poles about seven feet long, which project from the sides of the vessel.

fishing-banks (fish'ing-bangks), n. pl. A fishing-ground of comparatively shoal water in the sea. Thus, on the Atlantic coast of North America the Banks of Newfoundland are a famous fishing-ground, and another, about 30 miles off Cape May, is well known.

fishing-boat (fish'ing-bot), n. A boat used in fishing; also, a small fishing-vessel.

fishing-duck (fish'ing-dnk), n. See *duck*².

fishing-eagle (fish'ing-ē-gl), n. Same as osprey.

fishing-float (fish'ing-flōt), n. A raft or scow with a small house on it designed to be floated and anchored wherever desired for use in fishing.

A plank upon is let down from the edge to the bottom of the water, and over this, as upon an artificial shore, a seine is hauled by a windlass worked by horse or steam-power.

Fishing-floats are often clustered like a floating village, and the fish-raft made for large operations. They are peculiar to the mouth of the Susquehanna river and the neighboring region. [U. S.] fishing-frog (fish'ing-frog), n. The angler, a fish, Lophius piscatorius. See devil-fish.

fishing-hawk (fish'ing-hāk), n. Same as osprey.

fishing-line (fish'ing-līn), n. 1. A line used with hooks and bait in catching fish; a fish-line.—2. In coal., one of sundry simple elongated or extensible tentacular parts of some compound organisms, as the Siphonophora, provided with special urticating organs, thread-cells, or nematocysts.

fishing-net (fish'ing-net), n. Same as fish-net.

The waste and lumber of the shore.

Hard coils of cordage, swartly fishing nets.

Tennyson, Ench Arden.

fishing-out (fish'ing-out'), n. The removal of fish from a fish-pond; the "drawing" of a pond: as, the fishing-out of a carp-pond, that the fish may be placed in market-ponds.

fishing-place (fish'ing-plās), n. 1. A place where fishing is or may be carried on. Specifically—2. A prescribed length of shore in shore-fishing to which the sweep of a seine is limited. Such places are mostly situated on the tidal parts of streams and inlets, and can be fished only at certain stages of the tide, as during the flood or ebb. The most extensive are swept only at the turn of the tide, and these are known as slackwater-hauls. The importance of this species of property was early recognized and fostered by legislation. Also called pool. [A. S.] fishing-room (fish'ing-rōm), n. A definite portion of the shore appropriated to the curing and storing of fish. [American.]

My brother tells me that on Sunday 5th June, there was such a terrible storm that some of the fishing vessels were driven ashore, and much damage done to the fishing-rooms everywhere.

Quarterly Missionary Leaf, New Harbour Mission, (Newfoundland), No. XXXVII, Aug., 1885.

fishing-swivel (fish'ing-swiv'l), n. A swivel used on a fishing-line to prevent it from being kinked or snarled by the rapid gyrations of fish upon the hooks. The form of the swivel varies.

fishing-tackle (fish'ing-tak'l), n. An angler's outfit; angling-gear; the hooks, lines, rods, and other implements of the art of fishing.

fishing-tube (fish'ing-tūb), n. A small glass tube for taking up small objects floating in water. One end is closed with the finger and the other is thrust into the water near the object; on removing the finger the water enters the tube, conveying the object with it; on again closing the top of the tube, the object may be lifted with a portion of the water. Also called dipping tube.

fish-joint (fish'joint), n. In railroads, a splice consisting of one or more oblong plates of iron, bolted to the side or sides of two rails meeting end to end. See fish-plate.

fish-kettle (fish'ket'l), n. A kettle designed to be used for boiling fish whole.

fish-killer (fish'kil-er), n. A heteropterous insect of the genus Belostomat; a large water-bug occurring in fresh water, and preying on fishes by sucking their blood and juices.

fish-knife (fish'nif), n. A fish-carver.

fish-ladder (fish'lad-ēr), n. Same as fishway.

fish-line (fish'līn), n. A line used to catch fish.

fish-louse (fish'lous), n. A general name of crustacean parasites of fishes. Fish-lice proper belong to an order of other group of Crustacea known as Ichthyophthir, Siphonophora, and Lepid, of which there are many families with numerous genera and species, generally epizoe or ectoparasitic. They are not confined to fish's proper, being found also on cetaceans, crustaceans and other aquatic animals. Among them are found the most monstrous and grotesque forms of crustacean degraded by parasitism. See ent under Lepid.

fish-manure (fish'mā-nūr), n. A manure or fertilizer prepared from fish. There are many preparations and modes of manufacture. The value is mainly due to the preponderance of nitrogenous and phosphate compounds, the so-called ingredients being furnished more largely by fish manures than by any other class of fertilizers, except Peruvian guano. The crops most benefited by this fertilizer are those not specially helped by mineral fertilizers alone, as grass, grain, potatoes, some garden vegetables, and roots. As manure it is quick and stimulating, soon spending its force, and often leaving the soil worse than it was before its use. Also called fish-quant.

fish-market (fish'mār ket'), n. [= D. fischmarkt.] A market where fishes are sold.

fish-maw (fish'mā), n. The sound or air-bladder of a fish.

fish-meal (fish'mēl), n. 1. A meal of fish; diet on fish; abstemious diet.

Thou drink death so over cool their blood, and making many fish-meals, that they fall into a kind of made green-sickness.

Shak., 2 Hen IV, IV, 3.

2. Same as fish-flour.

fishmonger (fish'mung-ēr), n. [ME. fisch-, fisch-monger (= MA.G. fischmenger = G. fischmenger = Oldan. fischmenger; < fish + monger.)] A seller of fish; a dealer in fish.

Pol. Do you know me, my lord?

Ham. Excellent, excellent well; you're a fishmonger.

Shak., Hamlet II, 2.

fishmoth (fish'moth), n. Same as fish-lard.

fish-net (fish'net), n. A net used to catch fish. Fish-nets are divided into two classes—pull nets, in which the fish in attempting to pass through the net is wedged or jammed in a mesh so that it cannot open its gills, when it is soon drowned or is unable to move forward or backward; and enclosing nets, by which the fish is surrounded, as the purse net, the drag net, the seine, the weir, the casting-net, etc. Nets vary in construction from heavy chain oyster drags to fine-line third herring-nets, and they are given a variety of names, according to their shape, purpose, or mode of operating. Also fisher's net.

fish-of-Paradise (fish'ov-par'a-dis), n. A fish of the family Osphronemidae, Macropodus vari-

1. Macropodus variatus
2. Macropodus opercularis

variatus, so called from the beauty of its coloration. It has been cultivated to some extent for exhibition in aquariums.

fish-oil (fish'oil), n. Oil obtained from the bodies of fishes and marine animals, as from whales, porpoises, seals, pilehards, sharks' and cods' livers, etc.; specifically, cod-liver oil. Fish oil for medicinal purposes is obtained principally from the cod, but also from the pollack, turbot, haddock, etc.

fish-owl (fish'owl), n. An eared fishing-owl with rough feet; a member of the genus Ketupa.

fish-packing (fish'pak-ing), n. The act or process of packing or canning fish for the market. The fish are taken fresh to the packing house, where they are cleaned, cut, weighed, and put in hermetically sealed cans. The cans are placed in large steam chests where they are left until the fish are thoroughly cooked. The cans are then tested to see if they are air tight and are labeled.

fish-pearl (fish'pēr'l), n. An artificial pearl of an inferior grade. See the extract.

In Germany, on the other hand, a beautiful inferior quality of artificial pearls is made from the globe of glass forming the pearl mother, and very thin, and coated with wax they break or the slightest pressure. They are known by the name of German fish-pearls.

Eng. in H. 118.

fish-pie (fish'pi'), n. 1. A pie containing fish.—2. A compost-heap of fish-scrap mixed with earth.

fish-plate (fish'plāt), n. In railroads, an iron plate fitted to the web of a rail, and sometimes partly embracing the foot; used in pairs, one on each side of the junction of two rails, to join them end to end, and fastened together by bolts passing through the rails. When in position, they form a fish-point, and assist in supporting the ends of the rails as the train passes from one to another.

fish-poison (fish'poi zən), n. A name given to various plants which have the property of killing or stupefying fish. The number of such plants is very large, and the fruit is usually the part employed. Among the more commonly known are the Ammannia pinnatifida, usually called Crocodas Indicus; Piscidia Erythrina, a leguminous tree of the West Indies, the leaves of which are used; Lepidium Piscidium; the mullein, Verbascum Thapsus; and the red buckeye, Esculus Paria.

fish-pomace (fish'pəm ās), n. 1. The residuum or refuse of fish, as menhaden, after the oil has been expressed.—2. The crude state of fish-guano before it has been prepared as a fertilizer. Also called fish-chum.

fish-pond (fish'pənd), n. A pond containing fishes; especially, a pond in which fishes are bred and kept.

Fish-pools were made, where former Forests grew;
And hills were level'd to extend the View.
Prior, Solomon, ii.

fish-pool (fish'pöl), n. [< ME. fischepol, < AS. fiskepol, < fise, fish, + pöl, pool.] A pond or pool for fish.

Thine eyes like the fishpools in Heshbon, by the gate of Bathrabbim.
Cant. vii. 4.

fish-pot (fish'pə), n. A pot or creel for catching fish.

fish-preserve (fish'prē-zerv'), n. 1. A place where fish are preserved alive. Two kinds are commonly distinguished, the fresh- and salt-water.—2. A private fishery.

fish-prong (fish'prəng), n. A fish-fork with one time and a short handle, used in moving pickled or dried fish.

fish-pugh (fish'pug), n. A one-pronged fork or spear used in handling fish. C. Hallock, [Nova Scotia.]

fish-refuse (fish'ref ūs), n. A general name of any one of the several conditions or stages through which fish-scrap passes in the manufacture of fish-guano.

fish-roe (fish'rō), n. The roe of fish. It is much used for bait, a small quantity being secured to the hook in a bit of mosquito-netting or by means of wooden threads. For this purpose fresh roe is the best; but it can be preserved for a year in equal parts of salt and saltpetre.

fish-room (fish'rōm), n. On an English man-of-war, a small storeroom in the afterhold where fish and sometimes spirits were kept. Hamersly.

fish-sauce (fish'sās), n. Sauce to be eaten with fish, as anchovy, soy, etc.

fish-scale (fish'skal), n. A scale of a fish.—Fish-scale embroidery, embroidery consisting wholly or in part in the application of fish scales to the material to be decorated. The iridescent scales are selected, and are sewed to the stuff, being combined with the patterns of the needle-work.

fish-scrap (fish'skrap), n. Fish or fish-skins from which oil or glue has been extracted by cooking and pressing. Fish-scrap, in either a crude or a dried state, is of great commercial importance as a fertilizer. The menhaden fishery furnishes the greater part of the supply obtained in the United States. Acidulated fish-scrap, a preparation of fish-scrap with sulphuric acid to render the phosphoric acid contained in it more soluble and to hinder putrefaction.

fish-show (fish'shō), n. An exhibition of fish and fisheries.

fish-skin (fish'skin), n. The skin of fish; especially, this skin made into a sort of shagreen.

Fish-skin disease, n. mch. Ichthyosis (which see).

fish-slice (fish'slis), n. Same as fish-cutter.

fish-slide (fish'slid), n. A fish-trap for shallow rivers and low waterfalls; used in the southern United States.

fish-smother (fish'smuth ēp), n. A cooked dish of fish. [Grand Manan.] fish-sound (fish'sound), n. The swimming-bladder or air-sac of a fish. The sounds of some fishes are made interglute, and others, as in the case of the cod, are external.

fish-spear (fish'spēr), n. 1. A gig or lance, often having more than one tine, for spearing fish through ice or from a boat.

Cut thou till I have pathen—kin with barbed iron—
Or be head with fish-spears.
Job xli. 7.

2. A lance for bleeding captured whales.

fish-stage (fish'stāj), n. A stage for drying fish.

fish store (fish'stōr), n. A storehouse in which fish are stored or packed awaiting shipment to market.

fish story (fish'stōr), n. [In allusion to the supposed tendency of amateur fishermen to exaggerate in narrating their exploits.] An incredible or extravagant narration or tale. [Colloq., U. S.] fish-strainer (fish'strā'nēr), n. 1. A metal colander, with handles, for taking fish from a boiler.—2. An earthenware slab, with holes, placed at the bottom of a dish to drain the water from cooked fish.

fish-tackle (fish'tak l), n. Naut., a tackle used for fishing or raising an anchor to the gunwale of a ship. To this tackle a pendant is attached, with a large iron hook, called the fish-hook, fastened to its end.

fish-tail (fish'tāl), n. and a. I. n. 1. The tail of a fish.—2. A thysanurous insect of the family Lepismida, as Lepisma domestica or L. saccharina; a silver-tail; a silver-fish; in this sense properly fish-tail. See Lepisma. Also called fish-moth. [Local, U. S.]

II. a. Shaped like a fish's tail; resembling a fish's tail in any way.—Fish-tail burner. See burner.—Fish-tail propeller (naut.), a propeller consisting of a single wing or blade attached to the stern-post of a ship, and oscillating like a fish's tail.

fish-tongue (fish'tung), n. A dental instrument for the removal of the wisdom-teeth: so named from its shape.

fish-torpedo (fish'tór-pē dō), n. 1. A self-propelling torpedo. See torpedo.—2. A cartridge designed to be exploded under water for the purpose of killing fish.

fish-trap (fish'trap), n. A trap for catching fish. It may be a baited box or basket closed by hand, or a net, basket, or space shut in by stakes, with a funnel shaped entrance through which fish pass, but which has obstacles of some sort to prevent their egress.

fish-trowel (fish'trou'el), n. Same as fish-carver.

fish-van (fish'van), n. A covered vehicle adapted to run on passenger-trains, and fitted to carry fresh fish in crates or boxes. Car-Builders' Dict. [Eng.] fish-warden (fish'wār dn), n. An officer who has jurisdiction over the fisheries of any particular locality. Some of the States employ wardens to oversee the fisheries in streams and ponds, and prevent unlawful fishing. [U. S.] fishway (fish'wā), n. An arrangement for enabling a fish to ascend a fall or a dam. In the pool fishways the water falls through small vertical heights, the velocity being retarded by means of rocks and boulders or by falling into pools whence it is allowed to fall again through a slight vertical distance to be again retarded, and so on to the bottom. In the deflected-current fishways the current is retarded by being made to travel through a distance equal to many times the perpendicular descent, being frequently interrupted by objects so placed in its course as to cause a change in its direction. In the counter-current fishways the water is delivered down the incline without acceleration of velocity. This is accomplished by compelling the water to travel in a constrained path. Also called fish-ladder.

fish-weir (fish'wēr), n. Same as fish-garth.

fishwife (fish'wif), n.; pl. fishwives (-wivz). A woman who sells fish.

fishwoman (fish'wim'ān), n.; pl. fishwomen (-wim ēn). Same as fishwife.

fish-wood (fish'wūd), n. The strawberry-bush, Euonymus Americus.

fish-worker (fish'wēr kēr), n. A fish-culturist.

fish-working (fish'wēr king), n. Fish-culture; the artificial propagation of fish.

fish-works (fish'wērks), n. pl. 1. The appliances and contrivances used in fish-culture for the artificial propagation of fish.—2. A place where the products of the fisheries are utilized for a specific purpose, as the manufacture of oil, guano, etc.; a fish-factory: often used as a singular.

fishworm (fish'wērnm), n. Same as earthworm, 1.

fishy (fish'ī), a. [< fish + -y]. 1. Abounding in fish; inhabited by fish: as, the fishy flood.

Where are the flowry fields, the fishy streams,
The pasturing mountains, and the fertile plains?
Stirling, Doomed day, Third Hour.

2. Like fish; having a fish-like quality: as, a fishy taste or smell.

And when they arose early on the morrow morning, he told Dagon was taken upon his face to the ground before the ark of the Lord; and the head of Dagon and both the palms of his hands were cut off upon the threshold: only the fishy part of Dagon was left to him.
1 Sam. v. 4 (margin).

Than Amos with the fishy time,
That drove him, though cannon'd, from the spouse
Of Lot's son.
Milton, P. L., iv. 168.

3. Extraneous, as a story; dubious or incredible, like many stories told about fishing and fishes. Compare fish-story. [Colloq.]

We did not lose a man. This sounds rather fishy; but they had no artillery. New York Tribune, Nov. 25, 1861.

Altogether, the story is too fishy. The American, N. Y.

4. Dull and expressionless, like the eye of a fish. [Colloq.]

A stout woman with a broad red face and fishy eyes.
C. D. Warner, Their Pilgrimage, p. 15.

5. Equivocal, unsafe, or unsound, as a speculation or a course of conduct: as, a fishy venture. [Colloq.]

"I thought it was all up. Didn't you, Henry Sidney?"
"The most fishy thing I ever saw," said Henry Sidney.
Disraeli, Coningsby, l. 9.

6. Plucky; brave; sturdy and enduring; thorough and faithful in duty: as, fishy to the backbone; a fishy man. [Fishermen's slang.] fisk (fisk), v. i. [< ME. fisken, wander about, be in constant motion, < Sw. fjeska, fisk, fidge, fidget. Associated in sense, but not in etymological form, with fisk', fig', fidge, etc., and fisk, whisk.] To jump about; bustle or frisk about.

And what frek of thys folde fisketh thus a-boute,
With a bagge at hus bak a begenclens wyse?
Piers Plowman (C), x. 153.

Trotatrice, a fisking huswife, a ranging damsel, a gadding or wandering flirt.
Cotgrave.

Himself doth ambush in a bushy Thorn;
Then in a Caue, then in a field of Corn,
Creeps to and fro, and fisketh in and out,
And yet the safety of each place doth doubt.
Sylvester, tr. of Du Bartas's Weeks, ii., The Imposture.

fiskery (fis'kēr-ī), n. [< fisk + -ery.] Disposition to bustle or jump about; friskiness.

His fussiness and fiskery.
Carlyle, in Froude, II. 43.

fisnamy, n. See fisnomy.

fisnomy, n. [Early mod. E. also fisnomy, fisnomy; < ME. fisnomy, fisnomy, fisnamic, fisnomy, etc., < OF. phisonomic, phisonomic, phizonomic, F. physiognomie = Pr. phizonomia = Sp. fisonomia = Pg. physiognomia = It. fisonomia, < Gr. φωνογνωμία, late and incorrect form of φωνογνωσία, physiognomy: see physiognomy, of which fisnomy (with the mod. abbr. phiz) is a corrupted form.] 1. The art of judging the character of a person by the countenance or appearance.

The childe counthe of fysnomye.
Seren Sages, 1. 1072.

2. The face; countenance; appearance; physiognomy (which see).

He feyede his fysnomye with his foule hondez,
And frappez faste at hys face fersely there-aftry!
Morte Arthur (E. E. T. S.), l. 1114.

When he [a bear] was lose, to shake hiz carz twyse or thrise with the blind & the slauer about his fysnomye, was a matter of a goodly relect.
R. Lancham, Letter from Kenilworth (1575).

Faith, sir, a' has an English name; but his fisnomy is more hotter in France than here. Shak., All's Well, iv. 5.

fissate (fis'āt), a. [< L. fissus, pp. of findere, cleave (see fissile), + -ate]. Fissured; cleft; split; especially, in entom., having the apical portion divided or split into two parts. Specifically applied to the antenne when the last joint forms two long branches directed outward, like the prongs of a fork, as in certain Tenthredinidae.

fissel, v. and n. See fissel.

fissiless, a. See fissiless.

fissicostate (fis-i-kos'tāt), a. [< L. fissus, cleft, pp. of findere, cleave (see fissile), + costatus, ribbed: see costate.] Having the ribs divided.

fissidactyl, fissidactyle (fis-i-dak'til), a. [< L. fissus, cleft, + dactylus, a finger: see dactyl and dactylus.] Having cleft digits.

Fissidens (fis'i-denz), n. [NL. < L. fissus, cleft, + dens(-t)s = E. tooth.] A genus of terrestrial mosses, with simple or sparingly branched frondiform stems and two-ranked leaves, which are conduplicate below and winged on the back. The peristome has bifid teeth, like Dicranum. There are 24 American species.

fissil, v. and n. See fissile.

fissile (fis'il), a. [< L. fissilis, cleft, that may be cleft, < fissus, pp. of findere, cleave, split: see fent.] 1. Capable of being split, cleft, or divided into layers, as wood in the direction of the grain, or certain minerals and rocks in the planes of cleavage or foliation. See schist and cleavage.

This crystal is a pellucid fissile stone. Newton, Opticks.

A solid pumice-stone which possesses a fissile structure, like that of certain micaceous schists.

Barrin, Geol. Observations, l. 75.

A very fissile and smooth calcareous shale.
Amer. Jour. Sci., 3d ser., XXXI. 126.

2. In entom., formed of plates or scales which are closely appressed in repose, but may be spread apart: an epithet sometimes applied to lamellate antennae.

tongue) + -al.] Having the tongue cleft; specifically, of or pertaining to the Fissilingua.

Fissilingua (fis-i-ling'gwī-ū), n. pl. [NL., neut. pl. of fissilinguis, cloven-tongued; see fissilingual.] A group of lacertilian reptiles, with procelous vertebrae, cleft, slender, protrusile tongue, two valvular eyelids (except in Ophiops), the legs well developed, and the general aspect not serpentine. The group is made to contain the ordinary lizards of the family Lacertidae, the monitors or varanids, etc. See Ameiva and Leptodactylus. Also Fissilingues.

fissility (fi-sil'i-ti), n. [< fissile + -ity.] The quality of being fissile.

By which it is evident that diamonds themselves have a grain or a flaky texture, not unlike the fissility, as the schools call it, in wood.

Bowley, Works, III, 521.

fission (fish-on), n. [< L. fissio (u-), a cleaving, < fissus, pp. of fundere, cleave; see fissile, fissure.] 1. The act of cleaving, splitting, or breaking up into parts.—2. In biol., the automatic division of a cell or an independent organism into new cells or organisms; especially, such division as a process of multiplication or reproduction. Also fissuration. See cut under Parametion.

The human body is itself compounded of innumerable microscopic organisms, which . . . multiply, as the infusorial monads do, by spontaneous fission.

H. Spencer, Social Statics, p. 400.

Multiplication is effected through fission, that is to say, each globule or filament, after elongating, divides into two segments, each of which increases in its turn, to again divide into parts, and so on.

Quoted in Sci. Amer. Supp., p. 446.

fission-fungi (fish'on-fun'jī), n. pl. Bacteria.

fissipalmate (fis-i-pal'māt), a. [< L. fissus, pp. of fundere, cleave, split, + palmā, palm, + -ate.] Semipalmate; palmated with deeply incised webs; partly fissiped.

fissipalmation (fis-i-pal-mā'shon), n. [< fissipalmate + -ion.] Semipalmation; partial palmation or incomplete webbing of the toes.

fissipara (fi-sip'a-rī), n. pl. [NL., neut. pl. of fissiparus; see fissiparus.] In zool., a collective term applied to fissiparous animals, or organisms which propagate by fission or spontaneous self-division: it has no specific classificatory signification.

fissiparism (fi-sip'a-rizm), n. [< fissiparous + -ism.] In biol., reproduction by fission. See fission, 2.

fissiparity (fis-i-par'i-ti), n. [< fissiparous + -ity.] Same as fissiparism.

fissiparous (fi-sip'a-rus), a. [< NL. fissiparus, < L. fissus, pp. of fundere, cleave, separate, + -parus, < parere, produce; see parent.] Reproducing or multiplying by fission or spontaneous self-division, a mode of asexual generation by division into two or more parts, each of which, when completely separated, becomes a new individual: it is a usual process among the protozoans, protophytes, and other low organisms. See fission, 2.

There are organisms which are fissiparous, and when cut in two form two fresh independent organisms, so diffused is the vitality of the original organism; and the same phenomenon may be observed in regard to human communities.

Encyc. Brit., XXII, 461.

fissiparously (fi-sip'a-rus-li), adv. In a fissiparous manner; by fission or spontaneous division.

fissipation (fis-i-pā'shon), n. [Short for fissiparation*, < fissiparous + -ation.] In physiol., reproduction by fission. Mayne.

fissiped (fis'i-pēd), a. and n. [< L. fissipes (-ped-), cloven-footed, < fissus, cloven, cleft, + pes (-ped-) = E. foot.] 1. a. 1. Cloven-footed; having the toes cleft.—2. Specifically, of or pertaining to the Fissipedia.

II. n. A fissiped animal; specifically, one of the Fissipedia: opposed to pinniped.

Also written fissipede.

Fissipedia (fi-sip'e-dī), n. pl. See Fissipedia.

fissipedal (fis'i-pēd-āl), a. [< fissiped + -al.] Same as fissiped.

The Fissipedal Carnivores were divided by Cuvier into two groups.

B. H. Flower, Encyc. Brit., XV, 434.

fissipede (fis'i-pēd), a. and n. Same as fissiped.

It is described like fissipedes, or birds which have their feet or claws divided, whereas it is palmated or fin-footed like swans and geese.

Sir T. Brown, Vulg. Err., v. 2.

Fissipedia (fis-i-pē'dī-ā), n. pl. [NL., neut. pl. of L. fissipes (-ped-), cloven-footed; see fissiped.] A suborder of carnivorous mammals, of the order Fera, containing all the terrestrial carnivores, as distinguished from the aquatic seals and walruses, or Pinnipedia. They have the toes cleft, the first phalanges or digits of the feet not enlarged or produced beyond the rest, generally reduced or rudimentary, and the limbs free and fitted for walking and bearing the body up from the ground. The series includes some twelve living families, thus contrasting with three families of Pinnipedia. Also Fissipedes, Fissipeda.

Fissipennæ (fis-i-pen'ē), n. pl. [NL., < L. fissus, cleft, + penna, wing.] A group of small moths, related to the tineids; the plume-moths or featherwings, as of the genera Pterophorus, Alucida, etc. They are distinguished by the singular division of the wing into branches or rays, of which each part has from two to six. These are most beautifully fringed at their edges, and much resemble the feathers of birds. The plume-moths are of small size; some of them are diurnal and brightly colored; others are twilight-fliers, and of a dull aspect. Some species have the power of folding up the wings like a fan, so that when closed they present the appearance of a single ray. See Pterophoridae, and cut under plume-moth.

fissirostral (fis-i-ros'tral), a. [< NL. fissirostris (< L. fissus, cleft, + rostrum, beak) + -al.] In ornith., having the beak broad and deeply cleft, as a swallow, swift, or goatsucker; specifically, of or pertaining to the Fissirostres. This group has been abolished, but fissirostral is retained as a convenient descriptive epithet. — Fissirostral barbets. See barbet.

Fissirostral Bill of Goatsucker

Fissirostres (fis-i-ros'trez), n. pl. [NL., pl. of fissirostris; see fissirostral.] In Cuvier's system of classification, a division of his Passerina, including the swallows, swifts, and goatsuckers; an artificial group, the original components of which are now separated in different orders. It was formerly divided into Nocturna and Diurna. By some the Fissirostres were made to include various other broad-billed birds, as kingfishers, trogons, and bee-eaters.

fissive (fis'iv), a. [< L. fissus, pp. of fundere, cleave (see fissile), + -ive.] Pertaining to or of the nature of fission.

The whole plant is built up by the fissive multiplication of the simple cell in which it takes its origin.

Huxley and Martin, Elementary Biology, p. 415.

fissile¹ (fis'li), v. i.: pret. and pp. fissled, pp. fissling. [See; also written fissel, fissil, usually fizzle; an imitative word, in part a variant of E. whistle (in some parts of Scotland E. wh is sounded f): see fizzle and whistle.] 1. Same as fizzle, 1.—2. To rustle, as leaves in the wind.

He thought, Mr. Lovel, that he heard the curtains of his bed fissil.

Scott, Antiquary, ix.

3. To whistle, as wind through a keyhole.—4. To fidget. [Prov. Eng. or Scotch in all senses.]

fissura (fi-sū'rā), n.: pl. fissura (-rā). [L.: see fissure.] In anat.: (a) A fissure, cleft, rift, or chink between any two things or parts; as, the fissura palpebrarum (the opening between the eyelids). (b) Especially, one of the fissures or sulci of the surface of the brain, complementary to the gyri or convolutions. This Latin form is now used in comparatively few phrases. See fissure.

fissural (fis'ūr-āl), a. [< fissure + -al.] In anat., of or pertaining to a fissure or sulcus. See fissure.

To confine the discussion of the fissural pattern to a brief statement of what appear to be the constant and the inconstant fissural characters.

Wilder and Goss, Anat. Tech., p. 501.

fissuration (fis-ū-rā'shon), n. [= F. fissuration; as fissure + -ation.] 1. The act of fissuring, or the state of being fissured.

Whether fissuration be due to mechanical causes or represent lines of retarded growth, each fissure (in brains of idiots, etc.) is probably not due to a distinct process, but is in many cases, as Dr. A. J. Parker has shown, due to vegetative repetition.

Amer. Jour. Psychol., I, 34.

2. In biol., same as fission, 2.

The multiplication of the species is effected in some by spontaneous division or fissuration.

Jabez Hogg, The Microscope.

fissure (fis'h'ūr), n. [= F. fissure = Sp. fisura = Fr. fissura = It. fissura, fissura, < L. fissura, a cleft, chink, fissure, < fissus, pp. of fundere, cleave, separate, = E. bite; see bite, and cf. fract, fissile, and fission.] 1. A narrow longitudinal opening or groove; a cleft, crack, or chink; a line of separation in any substance produced by parting or cleavage: as, a fissure in the earth or in a rock.

A fissure into the Earth, of a great depth, but withal so narrow that it is not discernible to the eye till you arrive just upon it. Mannedell, Ab. p. 10 to Jerusalem, p. 6.

2. In surg. and anat., any solution of continuity in a bone, membrane, or muscle, or a natural division or groove between adjoining parts of like substance; a fissure: a sulcus; as, the longitudinal fissure of the brain, separating the hemispheres.—3. In entom.: (a) A deep, sharp longitudinal depression of a surface. (b) A very deep angular notch in a margin, almost dividing the part or organ.—4. In bot., the opening between segments of a cleft leaf or other organ; a slit formed by the dehiscence of an anther or a capsule.—5. In herc., a bearing resembling the bend sinister, but having one fourth the width of the bend, and capable of being borne on any part of the shield, sometimes in connection with others, sometimes with a bend sinister, a scurpe, or the like. Also called staff.—6. In pathol., a crack-like sore or ulcer; as, an anal fissure.—Auricular fissure, a fissure between the vaginal and mastoid processes of the temporal bone for the exit of the auricular branch of the vagus nerve. Buccal fissures. See buccal opening, under buccal. Calcarine fissure. See calcarina. Callosomarginal fissure, the sulcus bounding the gyrus fornicatus above, and turning up to terminate a short distance behind the upper extremity of the fissure of Rolando. See cut under convolution. Central fissure, the fissure of Rolando. Choroidal, collateral, crescent, fimbrial, etc., fissure. See the adjectives. Fissure of Rolando, a deep sulcus separating the frontal and parietal lobes of the cerebrum on each side, on the superior and external surface of the cerebrum. See cut under convolution and gyrus. Fissure of Sylvius, the largest, deepest, and most constant of the fissures of the mammalian brain. It has a short anterior and long posterior branch, the latter separating the temporal from the parietal lobe. See cut under convolution and gyrus. Fissures of the brain, in anat., the depressions or sulci separating the convolutions or gyri. See sulcus. Glaserian fissure, the cleft between the squamous and the tympanic elements of the temporal bone, separating the glenoid fossa proper from the vaginal plate of the tympanic, lodging the processus gracilis of the malleus, and transmitting the tympanic branch of the internal maxillary artery.—Great horizontal fissure of the cerebellum. See cerebellum.—Hippocampal fissure. See hippocampus.—Intraparietal fissure, a deep sulcus on the convex surface of the parietal lobe of each cerebral hemisphere. See cut under convolution.—Palpebral fissure, the cleft between the eyelids. See fissura.—Parieto-occipital fissure, a sulcus on the median surface of each cerebral hemisphere. Its extremity reaches the convex surface and marks the boundary between the parietal and occipital lobes. See cut under convolution.—Portal fissure, the porta or gateway of the liver; the short, deep transverse fissure on the under side of the right lobe joining the longitudinal fissure at right angles. Also called transverse fissure.—Pterygomaxillary fissure, the vertical interval between the body of the superior maxillary bone and the pterygoid process of the sphenoid bone, leading from the zygomatic fossa to the sphenomaxillary fossa.—Sphenoidal fissure, the interval between the greater and lesser wings of the sphenoid bone; the anterior foramen of the skull, throwing the cerebral and orbital cavities into communication, and transmitting the third, fourth, and sixth cranial nerves, and the first division of the fifth, and the ophthalmic vein. See cut under sphenoid.—Sphenomaxillary fissure, the horizontal interval between the sphenoid and superior maxillary bones, situated at the outer and back part of the bony orbit of the eye, throwing the orbital cavity into communication with the temporal, the zygomatic, and the sphenomaxillary fossae respectively.—Transverse fissure. Same as portal fissure.—Umbilical fissure, the cleft of the liver which receives the round ligament or the fibrous cord denoting the umbilical vein after its lumen is obliterated.

fissure (fis'h'ūr), v.: pret. and pp. fissured, pp. fissuring. [< fissure, n.] 1. trans. To cleave; split; divide; crack or fracture.

T. Hughes, Garth's Daughter.

2. Figuratively, to direct intently or persistently, so as to be as it were fastened to its object; as, to fix the mind on a subject; to fix the eyes or the attention.

Why are thine eyes fixed to the sullen earth?

Shak., 2 Hen. VI., i, 2.

There will I fix my heart: there dwells my love.

J. Beaumont, Psyche, ii, 188.

Shepherd, fix on me thy wondrous sight.

Beware, and view me well, and judge aright.

Corneille, Judgment of Paris.

Unless a book interests us, we cannot fix our attention to it.

J. F. Clarke, Self-Cultivation, p. 221.

3. To hold firmly; restrain from wandering or wavering; arrest; as, to fix one with the eyes; to fix the attention of an audience; to fix inconstant affections.

Images are said by the Roman church to fix the cogitations, and raise the devotions of them that pray before them.

Bacon, Advancement of Learning, ii, 205.

If I can fix myself, with the strength of faith, upon that which God hath done for man, I cannot doubt of his mercy in any distress.

Bacon, Sermons, ii.

She had by this time formed a little audience to herself, and fixed the attention of all about her.

You are to understand, that now is the time to fix or alienate your husband's heart for ever.

Shak., Tartar, No. 5.

4. To establish; give permanence or a permanent character to; make permanent; confirm.

Life to the king, and safety fix his throne.

Field, Prison Warlock, v, 2.

A greater Empress fix her was known.

She fixed the World in France.

Price, The Viceroy, st. 43.

The last two hundred years of constitutional progress in England have rested, not in changing the legal powers of the three great elements of the state, but in fixing by the silent understandings of an unwritten constitution, the way in which these powers are to be exercised.

E. A. Freeman, Amer. Lects., p. 599.

5. To establish in position or in a situation; settle or place stably; plant firmly; as, to fix a lance in rest; the fixed stars (see fixed, 2).

Between us and you there is a great gulf fix d.

Luke xvi, 26.

Fix thy foot [for combat].

Shak., Cor., i, 8.

You cannot shake him:

And the more weight you put on his foundation,

Now as he stands, you fix him still the stronger.

Shelley, Poetical Works, ii, 3.

The apostles did, presently after the ascension, fix an apostle or a bishop in the chair of Jerusalem.

J. E. Taylor, Works, ed. 1855, II, 164.

6. To make stable in consistence or condition; reduce from fluidity or volatility to a more permanent state; make less volatile or fugitive; as, cold fixes water in the form of ice; to fix colors by a mordant. A gas is fixed by combining it with a solid and a volatile, or with alcohol. A photograph negative or positive is fixed, or made permanent, by the removal of superfluous salts, especially those of silver, which would otherwise gradually blacken and destroy the image. This is usually done by means of hyposulphate of soda.

The portion of the plant to be hardened should be put into absolute alcohol, in which the cell wall very soon becomes rigid, and the protoplasm with slight contraction is fixed.

Berkes, Micros., in Botany (trans.), p. 178.

intended to work at the position where the fixing is situated; and when the fixing is adapted to them, it is then commonly called a wheel fixing.

4. In metal, the coating of the lining of the revolving chamber of the Banks furnace (see puddle) with a second or working lining, accomplished by covering the first lining with a melted coating formed of hydrated non-silicious ore of iron mixed with scrap-iron; also, the coating so applied. This fixing is analogous to the fettling of the ordinary puddling-furnace.—5. Establishment in life; the act of setting up in housekeeping, or of furnishing a house. [Colloq.]

If Patty would have remained at the castle, she might have had the command of all; or if she would have gone anywhere else, he would have paid for her fixing, let the cost be what it would.

The Maid of the Mill.

6. pl. Things needed for fixing, preparing, or putting in order; arrangements; embellishments; trimmings; garnishings of any kind; as, railroad fixings. [U. S.]

Coffee-cups, eggs, and the inevitable chicken-fixings, which it was henceforth our fate to meet . . . till we reached New Orleans.

Quoted in S. De Vere's Americanisms, p. 472.

fixing-bath (fik'sing-bath), n. 1. In photog., a chemical solution, usually of hyposulphite of soda in water, for removing from an exposed and developed negative or positive the remaining portion of the sensitive agent which has not been acted upon by light.

The negative fixing-bath consists of a strong solution of hyposulphite of soda, in the proportion of five or six ounces to the pint of water.

Leat, Photography, p. 35.

2. In leather-manuf., a bath of water acidified with nitric acid and to which a little glycerin is added, used in the process of tanning with catechu after the catechu-bath, and followed by a final rinsing to remove any free acid from the leather.

The tanner removes [the skins] from the previous liquor and prepares a new liquor termed the "fixing bath," consisting of water sufficient to cover the skins.

C. T. Davis, Leather, p. 601.

fixity (fik'si-ti), n. [= F. fixité = Port. fixidade, < L. as if fixita(t)-s*, < fixus, fixed; see fix.] 1. The state of being fixed; fixed character; fixedness; stability: as, fixity of tenure.

Are not the sun and fixed stars great arches vehemently hot, . . . whose parts are kept from fuming away not only by their fixity, but also by the vast weight and density of the atmospheres incumbent upon them?

Newton, Opticks.

I find nothing so subtly and inconceivably mournful among all the explicit miseries of the Greek mythology as this fixity of nature in the god or the man, by which the being is suspended, as it were, at a certain point of growth, there to hang forever. S. Lander, The English Novel, p. 88.

Permanency of type has so many exceptions, that variations of type, and the power to give fixity to some of these variations by means of cultivation or environment, must be accepted as a doctrine and a fact.

Science, N. 289.

Specifically—2. In physics, the state or property of a body in virtue of which it resists change under the action of heat or other cause.

fixture (fiks'tūr), n. [< fix + -ture; cf. mixture. The older form is fixure.] 1. A fixing, planting, or placing.

The firm fixture of thy foot would give an excellent motion to thy gait, in a semicircled forthgoing.

Shak., M. W. of W., iii. 3.

2. Fixedness; steadfastness. [Rare.]

I never beheld eyes that looked so inspired, so supernatural. They were like fires, half burning, half smoldering, with a sort of active fixture of regard.

Leigh Hunt, quoted in Lowell's Among my Books, [2d ser., p. 234.]

3. A fixed or appointed time or event; a definite arrangement; an appointment: especially used with reference to sports. [Eng.]

The subscriber expects to have a card sent to him with the club-hunting fixtures, and there are many who will go a long distance for a gallop through the woodlands in the early morning.

Edinburgh Rev., CLXVI. 410.

4. Anything placed in a firm or fixed position; something fixed and not intended to be removed; specifically, that which is fixed to a building; any appendage or part of the furniture of a house which is fixed to it, as by nails, screws, etc.: as, gas-fixtures.—5. In law, a personal chattel annexed or fastened to real property. In regard to the right of severance and removal, the term is used in two directly contradictory senses: (a) A chattel so annexed, which has thereby become in law part of the real property, and cannot legally be severed and removed without consent of the owner of the real property. This was the original use. (b) A personal chattel so annexed, but which remains in law a chattel, and may be severed and removed at will by the person who has annexed it, or his representative. Originally, chattels became part of the property to which they were attached, and were not legally removable except with the consent of the owner of the real property; but in more recent times the rule has been reversed as to certain kinds of fixtures, such as machinery put by a tenant into premises hired for purposes of trade, etc. Hence the ambiguity in meaning.

6. A person who or a thing which holds a fixed place or position; one who or a thing which remains so long in one position as to seem immovable.

In short, all the Franks who are fixtures, and most of the English, Germans, Danes, &c., of passage, came over by degrees to their opinion.

Byron, Child Harold, iii. notes.

fixuræ (fik-sū'rē), n. pl. [NL, pl. of L. fixura, fixure; see fixure.] Fibrils by which many thaloid plants are attached to their substratum: rhizine.

fix, v. and n. See fix.

fixgig (fiz'gig), n. [Also fixgig; < fixz + gig or gig's, gig being vaguely used.] 1. A frivolous, gadding girl.

For when you look for praises sound,
Then are you for light fixing crowd.
Gosson, Pleasant Quippes (1596).

2. A firework, made of damp powder, which makes a hissing or fizzing noise when ignited: in one form called by boys a volcano.

If there was a struggle in Shelley's breast between the rival attractions of wisdom on the lips of an elderly philosopher and of fiery fixings in the hands of a pair of electric boys, the struggle was quickly decided in favour of youth and frolic and fireworks.

E. Dowden, Shelley, i. 306.

fixgig (fiz'gig), n. A corrupt form of fishgig.
fizz, fiz (fiz), v. i. [More common in freq. form fizzle, formerly fissile; an imitative word, like hiss, sizzle, whizz, etc., without early record, except as in the sense fizzle, v. t., 3, where cf. lecl, fist = Dan. fise, break wind; see fise 1, fist 2.] To make a hissing or sputtering sound; fizzle.

O rare! to see their fizz and breath fizz, fiz (fiz), v. [< fixz, v.] 1. A hissing or sputtering sound.
I th' lugeet camp! Burris, Scotch Drink.

No rubbing will kindle your Lucifer match
If the fiz does not follow the primitive scratch.
A. W. Holmes, Verses for After-Dinner.

2. A light frothy liquid; specifically, in the United States, soda-water or other effervescent water; in England, champagne: so called from the hissing sound it makes when uncorked. Also fizzle.

Go shy with the champagne, . . . the vulgar sparkle of the fizz, one half of which now is doctored cider.

The Money-Makers, p. 131.

Gin fizz. See gin-fizz.
fizenless, fissenless (fiz'en-less), a. [Var. of fissionless, q. v.] Pithless; weak. Also fissionless. [Scotch.]

I will not wait upon the thowless, thrifless, fissenless ministry of that curial man, John Halfteit, the emate.

Scott, Old Mortality, v.

fizzle (fiz'l), v.; pret. and pp. fizzled, ppr. fizzling. [Also fissile; freq. of fizz, v. q. v. Cf. sizzle, whistle.] 1. intr. 1. To make a hissing sound; hiss or sputter, as a liquid or gas forced out of a narrow aperture, or a liquid discharging gas, or a wet combustible, as wood or gunpowder, burning: usually with special reference to the weakness and sudden diminution or cessation of such sound. Hence—2. To stop abruptly after a more or less brilliant start; come to a sudden and lame conclusion; fail ignominiously; specifically, in school and college slang, to fail in a recitation or an examination: often with out: as, the undertaking promised well, but it soon fizzled out; nearly the whole class fizzled in calculus. [Colloq. or slang.]

Fizzle: To rise with modest reluctance, to hesitate often, to decline finally; generally, to misunderstand the question.

Fable Library Man, XIV. 144.

The factions and revolutionary action of the fifteen has interrupted the regular business of the Senate, disgraced the actors, and fizzled out.

Gazette (Cincinnati).

3. To break wind. [Colloq.]

It is the easiest thing, sir, to be done.
As plain as fizzling rowle but wif your eyes,
And foame at th' mouth.
B. Jonson, Devil is an Ass, v. 3.

II. trans. In school and college slang, to examine (a student) with the result of failure on his part: as, the professor fizzled nearly the whole class.

fizzle (fiz'l), n. [< fixzle, v.] 1. Same as fizz, 2.—2. A fizzling or fizzing condition; hence, a state of restless agitation; a stew; worry: as, he is in a fizzle about his luggage. [Colloq.]

Whose beard—this a black, that melting to grizzle
Are smoking, and curling, and all in a fizzle.
Barham, Ingoldsby Legends, II. 80.

3. A breaking wind. [Colloq.]—4. A failure or an abortive effort; in particular, in school and college slang, a failure in a recitation or an examination. [Colloq. or slang.]

The best judges have decided that to get just one third of the meaning right constitutes a perfect fizzle.

Quoted in Colleg. Words, p. 202.

fjeld (fyeld), n. [Norw.: see fiell.] In Norwegian geography, as used by English writers, one of the high plateaus on the Scandinavian range, which are barren and unfit for cultivation. Often spelled field.

The tranquil sheet of water is completely encircled by the endless forest, only here and there above the dark mass of pines rise the slender edge of the open fjeld.
Emmett's Trav., N. S., XLIII. 87.

fjord, n. See fjord.

Fl. A chemical symbol of fluorine.

fl. An abbreviation of florin.

fla (flā), v. A dialectal variant of flag 2.

flabbergast (flab'ér-gast), v. t. [Also written flabergast, flabagast. Like many other popular words expressing intensity of action, flabbergast is not separable into definite elements or traceable to a definite origin; but there is perhaps a vague allusion to flabby (cf. flabberkin), or flap, strike, and gast, astonish: see flabby, flap, gast.] To overcome with confusion or bewilderment; astonish, with ludicrous effect: confound: as, the news completely flabbergasted him. [Colloq. and humorous.]

He was quite flabbergasted to see the amount.

Barham, Ingoldsby Legends, II. 314.

It would probably flabbergast most hard-core fowl to be asked the meaning of ceceaboon.

The New Mirror (New York), III. 129.

The alderman and town-councillors were what is sometimes emphatically styled flabbergasted. They were speechless from bewilderment.

flaffer (flaf'er), v. i. [Freq. of flaff.] To flutter. [Prov. Eng.]

flag¹ (flag), v. i. pret. and pp. flagged, pp. flagging. [Not found in ME., being a later form of ME. flacken, E. flack, hang loose; cf. OD. flaggheren, flaggheren, flag, droop; see flack.] I. intrans. 1. To hang loosely and laxly; droop from weakness or weariness.

And now loud howling wolves arouse the jades, . . . Who with their drowsy, slow, and flagging jaws

Chop dead men's graves, and from their misty jaws

Breathe foul contagious darkness in the air.

Shak., 2 Hen. VI., iv. 1.

The wounded bird, ere yet she breath'd her last,

With flagging wings alighted on the mast.

Pope, Iliad, xxiii.

A ship was lying on the sunny main!

Its sails were flagging in the breathless noon.

Shelley, Revolt of Islam, iii. 17.

2. To grow languid or less active; move or act more slowly; become feeble; droop; decline; fail; as, the spirits flag.

We may break off from the duty whenever we find our attention flags, and return to it at a more seasonable opportunity.

Ep. Atterbury, Sermons, I, x.

The subscriptions afterwards were more free and generous; but, beginning to flag, I saw they would be insufficient without some assistance from the Assembly.

Franklin, Autobiog., p. 194.

That flagging of the circulation which accompanies the decline of life.

H. Spencer, Prin. of Psychol. (2d ed.), § 100.

3. To grow stale or vapid; lose interest or relish.—4. To become careless or inefficient; slacken; halt.

If she should flag in her part, I will not fail to prompt her.

Conway, Way of the World, iii. 18.

5. [Cf. *flag*².] To flap; wave. [Prov. Eng.]

= Syn. 2. To languish, pine, sink, succumb.

II. trans. 1. To cause or suffer to droop.

[Rare.]

Nor need they fear the dampness of the sky
Should flag their wings and hinder them to fly, flag² (flag), n. [Early mod. E. flagge (= G. flagge), of D. or Scand. origin; OD. flagghe, D. flag = Sw. flagg = Dan. flag, a flag, orig. of a ship's flag; connected with Sw. dial. flage, flutter in the wind, and ult. with E. *flag*¹, flack, flacker, q. v. Cf. Icel. flögga = OHG. flagaron, flakron, flutter; OHG. flagezen, MHG. elogen, eloken, flutter, flicker; connected with Icel. fljaga (= OHG. fligjan, etc.), fly, = E. fly.] 1. A piece of thin, light fabric, especially bunting, usually rectangular and oblong or square, but sometimes triangular, notched, or otherwise varied in form, ranging from a few inches to several yards in dimensions, used hanging free from a staff to which it is attached or connected by one end, for many purposes, as a signal, symbol, cognizance, or standard, and differing in size, color, and emblematic marking or ornamentation, according to its intended use. The most common employment of flags is as military ensigns, colors, or standards, or emblems of nationality in all its modes of visible manifestation. In the army a flag is a banner by which one regiment is distinguished from another, and is usually called the colors. In the navy flags are borne at the masthead not only to designate the nationality of a vessel, but also to indicate the rank of the officer in command, an admiral's presence being denoted by his flag at the main, a vice-admiral carrying his flag at the fore, and a rear-admiral at the mizen. In the United States navy admirals' flags are blue, with four, three, or two stars, according to rank. When the President goes aboard, the national flag is displayed in the bow of his barge, or at the main of the man of war which receives him. In the British navy the supreme flag is the royal standard, which is to be hoisted only when the sovereign or one of the royal family is on board; the second flag has an anchor on a red ground, and characterizes the lord high admiral or lords commissioners of the admiralty; and the third is the union or national flag, in which the crosses of St. George, St. Andrew, and St. Patrick (the patron saints of England, Scotland, and Ireland respectively) are blended. This flag is appropriated to the admiral of the fleet. (See ensign, and union flag, under union.) The flag of the United States has since 1818 consisted of thirteen horizontal stripes (representing the thirteen original States of the Union), seven red and six white, placed alternately, with a blue union having displayed on it one white five-pointed star for each State in the Union. The Confederate flag had a similar union, but bore three bars, two red and one white, instead of the thirteen stripes. Flags are also used aloft and ashore for signaling. Flags are often raised on public buildings to show that they are open for business, or (as on the Capitol at Washington) that a legislative body is there in session. So, formerly, play-houses exhibited flags on their roofs when there were performances at them. When the players were out of employment, they were said to be flag-fallen (which see).

'Twas a shame, no less Than 'twas his loss, to curse your flying flags,
And leave his navy gazing. Shak., A. and C., iii. 11.
The hair about the hat is as good as a flag upon the pole at a common play-house to waft company.
Middleton, Mad World.

Flags, flutter out upon turrets and towers!
Tennyson, Welcome to Alexandria.

2f. The wing or pinion of a bird. [Poetical.]
Like as the haggard, cloister'd in her mew,
To scour her downy robes and to renew
Her broken flags. . . .
Jets off from perch to perch.
Quarles, Emblems, iii. 1.

3. In a glass-furnace having a grate-room in each end, a part of the bed intervening between the two grate-rooms and serving as a partition between them.—4. In ornith., the tuft of long feathers on the leg of falcons and most other hawks; the lengthened feathers on the crus or tibia. Cones.—5. In sporting, the tail of a deer or of a setter dog.

The setter's flag should have a gentle sweep.
Dogs of Great Britain and America, p. 101.
Quarters slightly sloping, and flag set on rather low, but straight, fine in bone, and beautifully carried.
Sportsman's Gazetteer, p. 417.

6. In music. See pennant and hook.—Black flag, a flag either of plain black or bearing some device associated with pirates and piracy, also with warfare when no quarter is to be given; a phrase used loosely to denote such warfare, or the intention, or avowed intention, of resorting to it.—Black Flags. See black.—Bloody flag. See red flag, below.—Boat flag, in whaling, a waif.—Flag of distress, any flag displayed as a signal of distress. When so used it is generally displayed upside down (called union down), or is hoisted only half-way to its usual place (called half-mast).—Flag of protection. See yellow flag and white flag.—Flag of truce, a white flag displayed as an invitation to the enemy to confer, or one carried by an officer sent to communicate with the enemy. During an engagement the bearer may be refused admittance into the lines, or he may be held. A flag of truce is regarded as especially sacred in character and significance, and any abuse of its privileges, as for the purpose of surreptitiously procuring military information, is condemned as an offense of peculiar heinousness. In naval engagements a flag of truce is met at a suitable distance by a boat from the senior officer's ship, in charge of a commissioned officer, and having a white flag plainly displayed from the time of leaving until her return.—Garrison flag, a large flag furnished to the principal military posts in the United States, to be displayed on occasions of national importance.—Knight of the square flag. See brunnet.—Red flag. (a) A flag of a red color with or without devices, associated with blood or danger: (1) The Roman signal for battle; hence, to hang out the red or bloody flag is often used, especially by earlier writers, to signify a challenge to battle.

When you are hearing a matter between party and party, if you chance to be pinched with the color, you . . . set up the bloody flag against all patience. Shak., Cor., ii. 1.

Stand for your own: unwind your bloody flag.
Shak., Hen. V., i. 2.

(2) The recognized standard or symbol of an extreme revolutionary party, or of those who seek social as well as political revolution or anarchy: as, the red flag of the Communists. (3) A signal displayed by boats carrying powder, and by ships of war when they are shipping or discharging powder. (4) A danger-signal in target practice and on railways: used on the latter to bring trains to a stand.

At every one of them [the stations] on the route a man popped out . . . and waved a red flag, and appeared as though he would like to have us stop. But we were an express train.
T. B. Aldrich, Bad Boy, p. 31.

(b) A piece of red flannel used as a lure for fish. (c) The bloody spout of a dying whale. To dip the flag, to lower the flag and then hoist it again, as a token of respect or courtesy.—To heave a flag aboard (haul), to hang it out. [Archaic or obsolete.] To hoist a flag at half-mast, to raise a flag half way up to its usual place as a token or signal of mourning. To strike or lower the flag, to pull down the flag in token of surrender.—White flag, a flag of pure white material, with or without a device, used to denote a peaceable disposition or intention, to secure from molestation in time of war.

By the semblance
Of their white flags display'd, they bring us peace.
Shak., Pericles, i. 4.

Yellow flag, a flag of a yellow color used as a sanitary signal. It is displayed on a vessel to show that contagious or infectious disease exists on board, or that the ship or boat has been placed in quarantine; over the house, ship, or boat which serves as the residence of a quarantine officer; and in time of war to indicate hospitals or other houses containing the sick or wounded, that the enemy may refrain from firing on them. In this case it is called the flag of protection.

flag² (flag), v. t.; pret. and pp. flagged, ppr. flagging. [< flag¹, n.] 1. To place a flag over or on; as, to flag a house.

At thy breast age
Then hadst within thy bosom solid contents
That might have ribb'd the sides and plank'd the deck
Of some flagged admiral [ship]. Cooper, Yardley Oak.

I was directed by him to vaccinate, flag premises where the disease existed, and to send those afflicted with the disease to the hospital. Santurman, XIV, 319.

2. To signal or warn by the use of a flag; as, to flag a train or a steamboat.—3. To decoy, as game, by waving some object like a flag to excite attention or curiosity.

One method of hunting them [antelope] is to take advantage of it [their curiosity], and flag them up to the hunters by waving a red handkerchief, or some other object, to and from the air.
T. Roosevelt, Hunting Tips, p. 194.

flag³ (flag), n. [Early mod. E. flagge; < ME. flagge, flagge = Dan. flag, flag; prob. ult. the same as flag², as that which flutters in the wind; see flag², n.] One of various endogenous plants with sword-shaped leaves, mostly growing in moist places; particularly, the common species of Iris, as the yellow flag or water-flag of England (I. pseudacorus), the white flag (I. Germanica), and blue flags of the United States, as I. versicolor and I. prismatica. The cattail-flag is Typha latifolia and other species; the cornflag of Europe, Glaboulus scutellum, etc.; the sweet flag, Acorus Calamus. The cattail-flag is used by coopers to tighten the seams of fish barrels. The term flag is also applied to the broad-leaved fixed seaweeds.

At the west end there growth the greatest store of flagges, in a marsh sole. . . . that ever I saw in my life.
Gargat, Candides, I. 142.

My spaniel, prettiest of his race, . . .
Now wanton'd lost in flags and reeds.
Cooper, Dog and Water-Lily.
There, with its waving blade of green,
The sea-flag streams through the silent water.
J. G. Percival, The Coral Grove.

flag³ (flag), v. t.; pret. and pp. flagged, ppr. flagging. [< flag³, n.] To tighten the seams of (a barrel) by means of flags. See flag³, n. Encyc. Brit., IX, 259.

flag⁴ (flag), n. [< ME. flagge, turf, sod, < Icel. flag, the spot where a piece of turf has been cut out, flaga, a flag or slab of stone, lit. a 'flake' (cf. flagna, flake off, as skin or slough, flakva, flake off, split; see flake), fla¹, flay¹, flac.] 1. A piece of turf; a sod. [Prov. Eng.]

Turf of flagge, sward of the erthe, cespes, terricidium.
Prompt. Parer, p. 506.

The dibbler, who walks backwards, and turning the dibbles partly round, . . . makes two holes on each flag, at the distance of three inches the length way of the flag.
A. Hunter, Georgical Essays, II, 355.

2. A flat stone used for paving.—3. A flake of snow. [Prov. Eng.]—4. A tuft of coarse grass. [Prov. Eng.] Caithness flags, series of dark, bituminous, durable, slightly micaceous and calcareous flaggy beds of the lower Old Red system of Scotland. They abound in fossil fishes and remains of land-plants, and are much used for flagging. The name is derived from Caithness in Scotland, where this form is well exemplified.

flag¹ (flag), v. t.; pret. and pp. flagged, ppr. flagging. [< flag¹, n.] To lay or pave with flags or flat stones.

The sides and floors were all flagged with excellent marble.
Sandys, Travels, p. 25.

flag⁵ (flag), n. [Perhaps a particular use of flag².] A groat; fourpence. [Thieves' cant.]

The orator pulled out a tremendous black doll, bought for a flag (fourpence) of a retired rag merchant, and dressed up in Oriental style.
Mayhew, London Labour and London Poor.

flag-bearer (flag'baer), n. One who bears a flag. The word does not, like the terms standard-bearer, pennant-bearer, gentleman, cavalier, coronet, and the like, convey the idea of military rank or of permanent office or appointment.

flag-captain (flag'kap tăn), n. Naut., the chief of an admiral's staff; the commanding officer of a flag-ship; same as fleet captain (which see, under captain).

flagella, n. Plural of flagellum.

flagellant (flaj'e-lant), a. and n. [= F. flagellant = Sp. flagelante = Pg. It. flagellante, < L. flagel- lau(-l)-s, ppr. of flagellare, whip, scourge; see flagellate.] 1. a. Given to flagellation, or the use of the rod; flagellating.

We find far more of hope and promise in the broad free sketches of the flagellant head master of Llan and the bibulous Bishop of Bath and Wells.

A. C. Swinburne, Shakespeare, p. 27.

II. n. One who whips or scourges himself for religious discipline; specifically, in hist., one of a body of religious persons who believed they could thus appease the divine wrath against their sins and the sins of the age. An association of flagellants founded in Italy about 1290 spread throughout Europe, its members marching in procession, publicly scourging their own bare bodies till the blood ran, having by these practices given rise to great disorders, they were suppressed; but the same scenes were repeated on a larger scale in 1313 and several subsequent years, in consequence of the desolating plague called the 'black death.' These flagellants blamed for their scourging the virtue of all the sacraments, and promulgated other heresies. There have been also traitments of flagellants authorized by the Roman Catholic Church. Some flagellants have held the truths opposed to the Roman Catholic Church, and approximating those of Protestantism.

When, from the corruption of its ministry, religion has lost its influence, as it did just before the Flagellants appeared, the State has been endangered.

H. Spencer, Universal Progress, p. 96.

flagellar (flaj-el'jar), a. [< flagellum + -ar.] In botan., pertaining to the flagellum of an antenna; as, flagellar joints.

Flagellaria (flaj-e-lä'ri-ä), n. [NL., < L. flagellum, a whip, scourge, + -aria.] A genus of endogenous plants, typical of the order Flagellariales. They are herbaceous climbers, with long, narrow leaves terminated by tendrils, panicles of persistent-colored flowers, and one-seeded, drupe-like fruit. There are only two species, of India and Australia respectively, of which F. indica is widely spread through the tropics of the old world.

Flagellariæ (flaj'e-lä'ri-ä), n. pl. [NL., < Flagellaria + -æ.] An order of endogenous plants, intermediate between the Liliaceæ and the Juncaceæ, found in the tropical regions of the old world. It includes 3 genera and 6 or 7 species. See Flagellaria.

Flagellata (flaj-e-lä'tä), n. pl. [NL., neut. pl. of flagellatus; see flagellate.] 1. A primary group of Infusoria, as distinguished from the Tentaculifera, or Acantha, and from the Alveola. They are minute organisms of monofidism structure and character, provided not with cilia proper or with tentacles, but with a long whip-like flagellum, or with two or more flagella, which may be situated together at one end of the body, or be widely separated. There are generally an endoplast and a contractile vacuole, but no permanent oral aperture, though there is an oral region of the body constituting the food vacuole, by which food enters along with a globule of water. The flagella are locomotory organs. The cell of which a flagellate infusorian mainly consists differs much in form in the different genera, being sometimes prolonged around the base of the flagellum like a collar, and the whole animal may have a ciliary investment. The flagella of the same animal may differ much, one being stout and only occasionally moved, the other forming a delicate cilium in constant vibration. The Flagellata multiply by various methods of fission and sporulation, and also by conjugation. Also called Mastigophora. Flagellata discostomata, same as discostoma-flagellata. Flagellata eustomata, an order of animals possessing one or more flagella in appropiate organs, but no locomotive organs in the form of cilia, a distinct oral aperture or cytostome invariably developed, multiplying by longitudinal or transverse fission, or by the subdivision of a whole or part of the body substance into sporular elements.—Flagellata pantostomata, an order of animals simply flagellate, as having a mouth characteristically adult stage, no supplementary lobate or ray-like pseudopod appendages, oral or ingestive area entirely undifferentiated, food substances being accepted indifferently at all points of the periphery.

flagellate¹ (flaj'e-lät), v. t.; pret. and pp. flagellated, ppr. flagellating. [= L. flagellatus, ppr. of flagellare (> It. flagellare = Pg. Pr. flagellar = F. flageller), whip, scourge, lash, < flagellum, a whip, scourge (whence E. flag, q. v.), dim. of flagrum, a whip, scourge; perhaps akin to E. blow.] To whip; scourge.

flagellate¹, flagellated (flaj'e-lăt, -lăt-əd), a. [< NL. flagellatus, furnished with a flagellum, < L. flagellum, a whip; see flagellum, and cf. *flagellate*², v.] 1. In bot., furnished with flagella, or slender whip-like processes; flagelliferous; as, a flagellate infusorian (in this use technically opposed to ciliate).

Just as do the flagellate zoospores of Protozoites.
W. B. Carpenter, Micros., § 393.
A large series of more complex forms of flagellate Infusoria has been recently brought to our knowledge.
W. B. Carpenter, Micros., § 424.

2. Like a whip-lash: flagelliform; as, a flagellate process.—3. In bot., producing filiform runners or runner-like branches. Flagellate cell. See cell. Flagellate chambers. Same as ciliate cells, which see, under ciliate.

flagellate², v. An obsolete perversion of *flagellate*¹.

flagellation (flaj-e-lăt'shun), n. [= F. flagellatum = Sp. flagellatum = Pg. flagellatio = It. flagellazione, < L. flagellatio (n.), < flagellare, whip; see *flagellate*¹, v.] A whipping or flogging; the discipline of the scourge.

This labour past, by Bridewell all descend
(As morning prayer and flagellation end).
Pope, Dunciad, ii. 270.

History makes us acquainted with many curious instances in the heathen world where the images of the Deities worshipped have been very roughly treated, and even suffered public flagellation, for not having averted the calamities which had been decreed.

T. Comin, On the Passions, I. i. § 3.

flagellator (flaj'e-lăt-tor), n. [= F. flagellator = Pg. flagellator = It. flagellatore, < ML. flagellator, one who whips, one of the flagellants, < L. flagellare, whip; see *flagellate*¹, v.] One who whips or scourges.

flageller, n. [ME., < L. flagellum, a whip; see *flagellate*¹, v.] A whip; a scourge.

[NL.] In bot., a long lash-like appendage to certain infusorian, bacterian, and protoplasmic reproductive bodies, in cryptogams; a large cilium. By means of rapid vibration it serves as an organ of locomotion.

The flagella . . . become visible in the hanging-drop at one or both extremities of the bacterium by forming an eddy.
Haeppel, Bacteriological Investigations (trans.), p. 73.

Flagella can be characterized (in Infusoria) as isolated and more or less elongate cilia. S. Kent, Infusoria, p. 44.

4. In entom., the outer portion of a geniculate antenna, or of any antenna which has a long basal joint with shorter and regular joints beyond it. The basal joint is then called the scape, and the remainder of the organ is the flagellum. In Diptera and Neuroptera it includes the whole antenna, exclusive of the two basal joints or scapes.

flageolet (flaj'ö-let), n. [Also written flagelet, and formerly flagellato (simulating flagellate); < OF. (and F.) flageolet, a pipe, whistle, flute, dim. of OF. flageol, flageol, flageol, flageol, flageol, etc., = Pr. flageol, flageol, a flageolet, flute, < ML. as if flautulus*, dim. of flauta, a flute; see flute, n.] A musical instrument of the flute or whistle class, in which the tone is produced by a stream of air striking against a sharp edge.

Flageolet.

It consists of a mouthpiece, usually a bulb in which the tone is produced, and a tube with six fingerholes. Its compass is a little more than two octaves upward from the G next above middle C. It is not now used in the orchestra. It is the representative of the ancient and medieval flute, its immediate precursor being the recorder. It is often called a flute-d'ober, in distinction from the modern German or transverse flute. The penny whistle is a cheap form of it.

First, he that led the cavalere
Wore a sow-gelder's flageolet,
On which he blew as strong a levet
As well-fed lawyer on his brevete.
S. Butler, Hudibras, II. ii. 610.

Well-taught he all the sounds express'd
Of flageolet or flute.
Comper, Death of Mrs. Throckmorton's Bullfinch.

Odor; smell.

Alle swete savours, that men may be fel,
Of alken thing that here savours wele,
War nocht bot as stynk in regard of that flayre
That es in the cete [city] of heven so fayre.

[Hampole, Fick of Conscience, l. 16017.]

2. [Mod. F. use.] In hunting, scent; sense of smell; used figuratively in the extract.

In addition to the industry and accuracy which are indispensable to an editor, he has keen poetical appreciation and insight, and a flair which always leads him right.

[A. and G. 4th ser., IX. 96.]

flair³, flaire (flar), n. [< OF. flaur, a sort of fish, Cf. preflaur.] 1. The skate, Raja batia. [Scotch (Aberdeen).]—2. Same as flay-flaur.

flake¹ (flak), n. [< ME. flake, a flake (of snow, etc.), of Scandinavian origin; < Norw. flake, a slice, a piece, as of ice, torn off, an ice-floe, = Sw. dial. flag, flak, a thin slice, Sw. fluga, a flake, flaw, crack, = Dan. fluge, flake (see fluge, snow-flake); cf. Lecl. flagna, flake off, split, = Norw. Sw. flagna, peel off; see flake⁴, flake⁵, flake⁶.] 1. A small flat or scale-like particle or fragment of anything; a thin fragment; a scale; as, a flake of tallow; a flake of flint; a flake of snow. As applied to chips or fragments detached from a mass of rock or mineral, flake often refers especially to such chips or fragments produced in the process of making stone weapons, especially in prehistoric times. Flint and of similar are the materials which, in consequence of their characteristically conchoidal fracture, can most readily be made to take a desired form by chipping or flaking; but when these were not to be had, chert, Jasper, quartz and even rocks of various kinds, have been utilized in this way. There are many localities where these chips or flakes (as the larger and more regular chips are sometimes designated), cores, broken tools, stone hammers, and other similar relics, are found heaped together in large quantities, indicating the abandoned sites of workshops.

The flake of his flesh are joined together; they are firm in themselves.

[Job, li. 23.]

The businesses of men depend upon these little long flake or threads of hemp and flax.

[De. H. Moore, Antislavery against Atheism.]

Great flake of ice encircling our boat.

[Evelin.]

Upon throwing in a stone the water boils for a considerable time, and at the same time are seen little flake of scurf rising up.

[Addison, Travels in Italy.]

In starry flake, and pollicle,

All day the hoary meteor snow fell.

[Whitice, Snow Bound.]

2. Among florists, any variety of carnation in which the petals are marked with stripes of one color upon a white ground.

So early as 1760 we find that the carnation was divided into four classes, . . . The Flake were those having two colours only the stripes going the whole length of the petals.

flame (flām), n. [Also dial. flam, flamb; < ME. flambe, flambe, flambe, flambe, < OF. flambe, flambe, flambe, F. flambe = Pr. flama = Sp. flama = Pg. flama = It. flama = D. flam = MLG. flama = MHG. flamme, flamme, G. flamme = Sw. flamma = Dan. flamme, flame, < L. flamma, flame, blaze, blazing fire, orig. flagma*, Cf. flagm* in flagrare, burn, blaze; see flagrant. Cf. phlegm (formerly also flem, etc.).] 1. A blaze; vapor in combustion; hydrogen or any inflammable gas in a state of visible combustion. Flame is attended with great heat, and generally with the evolution of much light; but the temperature may be intense when the light is feeble, as is the case with the flame of burning hydrogen gas. The flame of a burning body, as of a candle, may be divided into three zones: an inner zone, containing chiefly unburned gas; a central, containing partially burned gas; and an outer, in which the gas is completely consumed by combination with the oxygen of the air. The luminosity of flame depends upon the presence of solid matter or of dense gaseous products of combustion.

The reducing flame (as of a blowpipe) is that part of the flame which is deficient in oxygen for combustion (RF in figure), and which has therefore a reducing effect, or, in other words, tends to deprive the substance under examination of oxygen; the oxidizing flame is that part (OF in figure) in which the oxygen is in excess, and which exerts the opposite or oxidizing effect. The distinction is important in blowpipe analysis.

There be 7 places that brechen and that casten out dyverse flames and dyverse colour.

Manderille, Travels, p. 55.

And the angel of the Lord appeared unto him in a flame of fire out of the midst of a bush.

Sw. flamingo, < Pg. flamingo, formerly flamapo = Sp. flamenco, a flamingo, an acrobat, simulating Pg. Flamapo, Sp. Flamenco, a Fleming, in F. Flamand (see Fleming), of Fr. flamant, flambant, OF. flaman, also flambant, F. flamant, a flamingo, lit. flaming, blazing, in allusion to its scarlet plumage; ppr. of Fr. flamar = OF. flamar, etc., flame, blaze; see flame, v.] Any bird of the family Phoenicopteridae: so-called from the red or flaming color. Flamingos have extremely long slender legs and neck, a relatively small body, and a large bill bent abruptly in the middle and furnished with lamellae like a duck's. The feet are webbed, and the whole structure is intermediate between that of gallinaceous birds, like herons and storks, and wading birds, like the duck tribe. They thus constitute a superfamily group, called Phoenicopterophila, from the equivocal structure. There are about eight species, of which the best-known is the common flamingo of the old world, Phoenicopterus antiquorum. The red flamingo of tropical and subtropical America is P. ruber; the African species is P. minor. There are two peculiar to South America, P. ignipallatus and P. andinus. Details of structure have caused the erection of four genera for these birds.

Red Flamingo. Phoenicopterus ruber.

flammeous (flām'ē-us), a. [< L. flammus, flaming, fiery, < flamma, a flame: see flame, n.] Pertaining to or consisting of flame; like flame.

This flammeous light is not over all the body [of the glow-worm]. Sir T. Browne, Vulg. Err., iii. 27.

flammi ferous (fla-mi'f'e-rus), a. [L. flammifer, < flamma, flame, + ferre = E. bear.] Producing flame. Coles, 1717.

flammi vomous (fla-miv'ô-mus), a. [L. flammivomus, vomiting flames, < flamma, flame, + vomere, vomit.] Vomiting flames, as a volcano. Coles, 1717. [Rare.]

Shine Vulcan's shop is here —
Hark, how the anvils thunder round the dens Flammivomous! W. Thompson, Sickness, iii.

flamulated (flam'û-lâ-ted), a. [L. flammulatus, a little flame; see flammule.] In ornith., pervaded with a reddish color; ruddy; reddened; as, the flamulated owl. Scops flammula.

flammule (flam'ûl), n. [L. flammula, a little flame, dim. of flamma, a flame; see flame.] A little flame; specifically, one of the little flames associated in pictures, etc., with Chinese and Japanese gods and other sacred beings, to whose superhuman nature they testify in the manner of the aureole and nimbus.

flamy (dâ'mi), a. [< flame + -y.] Pertaining to, consisting of, or like flame.

My thoughts, imprison'd in my secret woes,
With flamy breaths do issue out in sound.
Sir P. Sidney.

Yonder cloud behold,
Whose saracen skirts are edged with flamy gold.
Pope, Dunciad, iii. 254.

How gloriously about the sinking sun
The flamy clouds are gathered!
Bryant, Tale of Cloudland.

flan¹ (flan), n. [See, also flann; < leel. flan, a rushing; cf. flann, rush heedlessly.] 1. A sudden gust of wind from the land; a flaw.

Tho' the wind be not so strong, there will come flanns and blasts off the land.
Brent, Description of Shetland, p. 81.

2. Smoke driven down the chimney by gusts of wind.

flan² (flan), v. t.; pret. and pp. flanned, pp. flanning. [< OF. flan, a loophole, embrasure; prob. a var. of flanc, side; see flank.] In arch., to play or level internally, as a window-jamb.

flan³ (flan), n. [Origin obscure.] A small round net for covering the openings of rabbit-burrows when the rabbits are hunted with ferrets.

After the holes are . . . covered with purse-nets, called flans, the ferret should be put in.

flan⁴ (F. pron. flôn), n. [F., < OF. flan, flon, floun (later also flanc), a blank for coining; a particular use of floun, a cake, tart. > E. flawn; see flawn.] A piece of metal shaped ready to form a coin, but not yet stamped by the die. Same as blank, 9.

These Syracusan bronze coins were extensively used in Sicily, chiefly by the sickle towns, as blanks or flans on which to strike their own types.

E. F. Wood, Historia Numorum, p. 157.

flancard, n. [< OF. flancard, also flancart, flanchard, armor for the flanks of a horse (cf. flancart, adj., of the flank or side), < flanc, side, flank; see flank.] n. In armor, plated armor for the flanks of a war-horse. Also flanchard. Compare flancher.

Some had the manerles, the close gantlettes, the gussets — the flancardes dyed & gutted with red, and other had them speckled green.

Hall, Hen. IV., iii. 1.

flanch (flanch), n. [An assimilated form of flank, further altered to flange; see flank.] 1. A projection; a flange.

A car fully made piston . . . having a flanch rising four or five inches, and extending completely around its circumference.

Thurston, Steam Engine, p. 64.

2. In herc., a bearing composed of a part of the field bounded by a curve projecting boldly into the field from one side and nearly reaching the fesse-point. In some continental systems of heraldry the flanch is bordered by a right line, meeting in a right angle, and therefore resembling a pile, but less neatly pointed. Flanches are always borne in pair, and the es cutcheon charged is usually commonly blazoned flanché. See cut under flanché. Also flanco and flanché. Compare flanchard.

flanchard, n. Same as flancard.

flanché (flanché), a. In herc., charged with a part of flanches.

The tincture of the flanch is mentioned in the blazon, and it often happens that instead of a single tincture the surface of the flanch is covered with herc. and identified with some person other than the bearer. Sometimes the flanch is charged with the armed arm of the bearer, and their position on the flanch part of the field is in the form of a denier cadency or pence difference. Also flanché.

flancher, [ME. flancher, < OF. flancher, housing for the flanks of a war horse, < flanc, side, flank; see flank.] In armor, housing for the flanks of a war-horse. Also flancher. Compare flancard.

flanconade, flannade (flang-ko-nâd'), n. [F., < flanc, flank, side.] In fencing, the ninth and last thrust, usually aimed at the side. Robundo (ed. Forsyth).

flandant, n. A kind of pinner attached to the cap or bonnet worn by women toward the close of the seventeenth century.

Will it not be convenient to attack your flandant first, says the maid? More anger yet? still military terms?
Dunton, Ladies Diet.

Flanderer, n. [< Flander-s + -er.] A native of Flanders. See Fleming.

These German colonists are, in a yet existing document, referred to as Flanderers. Contemporary Rev., LI. 328.

Flanders brick. See brick.

Flandrish, a. [ME. Flaundrisch; < Flander-s + -ish.] Flemish.

Upon his heed a Flaundrisch bever hat.
Chaucer, Gen. Prolog. to C. T., l. 272.

flânerie (dâ-nê-rê'), n. [F., < flâner, lounge, gossip; see flâner.] Lounging; the idle, sauntering life of a flâneur.

It is by the aimless flânerie which leaves you free to follow capriciously every hint of entertainment, that you get to know Rome. H. James, Jr., Trans. Sketches, p. 126.

flâneur (flâ-nêr'), n. [F., a lounge, loiterer, < flâner, lounge, loiter, stroll about, dial. gossip; cf. leel. flann, rush heedlessly; see flan.] An idle, gossiping saunterer; one who habitually strolls about idly.

More unlooked for happenings, more incidents in the drama of real life will happen before midnight to the individuals who compose the orderly Boulevard procession in Paris than those of its chaotic Broadway counterpart will experience in a month. The latter are not really more impressive, because they are apparently all running errands and include no flâneurs. The flâneur would fare ill should anything draw him into the stream.
New Princeton Rev., VI. 93.

flang¹ (flang), n. A Scotch and obsolete English preterit of fling.

flang² (flang), n. [Origin obscure.] In mining, a two-pointed pick.

flange (flang), n. [A later form of flanch, which is an assimilated form of flank; see flanch, flank.] 1. A projecting edge, rim, or rib on any object, as the rims by which cast-iron pipes are connected together, or the marginal projections on the tires of railroad-car wheels to keep them on the rails.

2. A strengthening rib; as, the flange of a fish-bellied rail or girder. — 3. A plate placed over the end of a pipe or cylinder to close it partly or wholly. — Backing-up flange, a flange or collar by which a body is held firmly to its seat or bearing. Blank flange, a plate used to close the end of a flanged pipe.

flange (flang), v.; pret. and pp. flanged, pp. flanging. [< flange, n.] I. intrans. 1. To project out.

I have seldom looked on the east end of a church with more complete sympathy. As it flanges out in three wide terraces, and settles down broadly on the earth, it looks like the poop of some great old battle-ship.

R. L. Stevenson, Inland Voyage, p. 188.

2. To be bent into a flange; take the form of a flange.

II. trans. To furnish with a flange; make a flange on.

flange-gage (flang'gaj), n. In rail, a gage for determining the correctness of the distance between the inside and the outside of flanges. Also called distance-gage. Car-Builder's Dict.

flange-joint (flang'joint), n. A joint in pipes, etc., made by two flanges bolted together.

flange-lip (flang'lip), n. In rail, a dovetailed projection on the wheel-center entering into a corresponding groove in the tire to hold on the flange in case of accident, but otherwise sustaining no strain. Car-Builder's Dict.

flange-pipe (flang'pip), n. Pipe of which the separate lengths or sections are provided with flanges, so that the ends can be butted and held together by bolts.

flange-rail (flang'rail), n. A railroad-rail furnished with a flange on one side to prevent the wheels of locomotives from running off the line.

flange-wheel (flang'hwêl), n. A car- or carriage-wheel having a guide-flange on one or both sides of the tread.

flanging-machine (flang'jing-mâ-shên'), n. A machine for bending the edges of boiler-iron, ship-plates, or sheet-metal to form a curved or bent edge or flange. For pipes and hollow ware such machines are made in the form of a revolving mechanism which presses the edge of the tube or vessel against an anvil, or of a wheel which traverses the edge of the vessel, bending the edge back as it advances. In other forms, as in the flanging-press, the edge of a flat plate is bent by direct pressure in a hydraulic press.

flanging-press (flang'jing-pres), n. See flanging-machine.

flank¹ (flangk), n. and a. [< ME. flank, flawnk, the flank (def. 1). = D. flank = G. Dan. flanke = Sw. flank, < OF. flanc, F. flanc = Pr. flanc = *Sp. The posterior part of either side of an animal, between the ribs and the hip; also, the thin piece of flesh constituting this part.

The sides, flanks, and bellic [of the chameleon] meet together, as in fishes.
Holland, tr. of Pliny, viii. 33.

The two kidneys, and the fat that is on them, which is by the flanks, . . . shall he take away.
Lev. iii. 4.

And nuzzling in his flank, the loving swine
Sheath'd, unware, the tusk in his soft groin.
Shak., Venus and Adonis, l. 1115.

2. In cutom., the pleura or side of an insect's thorax. — 3. Milit., one of the sides of an army, or of any of its divisions, as a brigade, regiment, or battalion; as, to attack the enemy on the right flank.

When to right and left the front Divided, and to either flank retired.
Milton, P. L., vi. 570.

The front attack was kept up so vigorously that, to prevent the success of these attempts to get on our flanks, the National troops were compelled, several times, to take positions to the rear nearer Pittsburg Landing.

U. S. Grant, Personal Memoirs, I. 340.

Hence — 4. A side of anything; as, the flanks of a building.

Mountains have arisen since
With cities on their flanks.

Contemporary Rev., LIII. 13.

flapdoodle (flap'dö-ül), n. [< flap, stroke (hence 'datter'?), & doodle, a simpton, fool.] 1. The stuff on which fools are feigned to be nourished: food for fools. [Humorous.]

"The gentleman has eaten no small quantity of flapdoodle in his lifetime." "What's that?" "It's the stuff they feed fools on." Macgregor, Peter Simple, XVIII.

Flapdoodle, they call it, what fools are fed on. T. Hughes, Tom Brown at Oxford, XI.

2. Transparent pretense or nonsense, as gross flattery, nonsensical talk, or foolish boasting.

flap-door (flap'dôr), n. A form of door with the hinges on the lower side, so that it opens downward and outward. Also called falling door.

flapdragon (flap'drag on), n. [flap + dragon.] Also called snappedragon, q. v. The allusion is to the popular fiery dragon or fire-drake. 1. A play in which the players snatch plums, raisins, or other things out of burning brandy or spirits, and swallow them: snappedragon; also, the materials for the game.

Stab'd with arrows, flapdragons, healths, whiffs, and all such waggering humours. B. Jonson, Cynthia's Revels, v., Palinode.

I'll go afore, and have the bonfire made,
My fireworks, and flapdragons, and good backrack. Fletcher, Beggars Bush, v. 2.

2. A plum, raisin, or other thing to be snatched from the burning liquor in playing flapdragon. See the extracts.

He . . . drinks off candles' ends for flapdragons. Shak., 2 Hen. IV., ii. 4.

Flapdragons are plums, &c., placed in a shallow dish filled with some spirituous liquor, out of which, when set on fire, they are to be dextrously snatched with the month. This elegant amusement was once more common in England than it is at present, and has been at all times a favourite one in Holland. Thus in Ram Alley: "My brother swallows it with more ease than a Dutchman does flapdragons."

Gifford, Note to B. Jonson's Cynthia's Revels, v., Palinode.

Such were flapdragons, which were small combustible bodies fired at one end and floated in a glass of liquor, which an expectant taper swallowed unharmed, while yet blazing. T. D'Israeli, Curios, or Lat., III. 31.

flapdragon (flap'drag on), v. t. [flapdragon, n.] To swallow at one gulp; snatch and devour, as in the play of flapdragon.

To make an end of the ship:—to see how the sea flapdragoned it. Shak., W. T., iii. 3.

flap-eared (flap'êrd), a. [flap + ear + -ed.] Having broad, loose, flapping ears.

flapjack (flap'jak), n. [flap + jack, used vaguely.] A cake of batter baked on a griddle, in a shallow pan, or on a board; so called from the practice of tossing the cake into the air when it is done on one side, by a dexterous movement of the griddle, in such a manner as to turn it over and catch it again flat upon the griddle with the baked side uppermost. Also flapjack.

We'll have flesh for holidays, fish for fasting-days, and moreover puddings and flapjacks. Shak., Pericles, ii. 1.

Until at last, by the skill of the cook, it is transform'd into the form of a flapjack, which in our translation is call'd a pancake. John Taylor, Jack-a-Lent, i. 115.

flap-keeper (flap'kê pēr), n. A man whose duty it is to open the flaps of a sewer to allow the escape of sewage at low tide.

flap-mouthed (flap'moutht), a. Having loose, hanging lips, as a dog.

When he in homel hath ceased his ill resounding noise,
Another flap-mouthed mounier, black and grim, Against the welkin volleys out his voice. Shak., Venus and Adonis, I. 939.

flapper (flap'êr), n. 1. One who or that which flaps.

It would be as a rudder to stirre and conduct him into a storm port, and an excellent flapper to drive away the flood of all worldly vanities. Ben Jonson, Passengers' Dialogues (1619).

In each bladder was a small quantity of dried peas, or little pebbles, &c. Afterward informed—With these bladders they now and then flapped the mouths and ears of those who feed on them, of which practice I could not then conceive the meaning. It seems the minds of these people, the dreamy phibosophy of Laputa are so taken up with idleness, speculation, that they neither can speak nor attend to the discourses of others, without being roused by some external application to the organs of speech and hearing. For which reason those persons who are able to afford it always keep a flapper, . . . in their family, one of them domestic. . . . The flapper is like wren employed diligently to attend him, in order to hit with, and upon occasion to beat him a rattling flap on his eyes. Swift, Gulliver's Travels, iii.

2. A reminder; something designed to fix or direct the attention; in allusion to the flappers of Laputa. See extract from Swift, above. [Humorous.]

To . . . come by way of dapper, to put you in mind of it. Charles Child.

3. A young bird when first trying its wings; especially, a young wild duck which cannot fly, but flap along on the water.

Some young men down lately to a pond . . . to hunt flappers or young wild ducks. Gilbert White.

A good bag can be made at them in the fall, both among the young flappers . . . and among the hunchs of wild duck. T. Roswell, Hunting Trips, p. 54.

4. Same as flapper-skate.—5. pl. Very long shoes worn by negro minstrels.

flapper-skate (flap'êr-skât), n. A local English and Scotch name of species of Raia or ray, as the Raia macrorhyncha and R. fullonica.

flappet (flap'et), n. [flap + -et. Cf. flacket.] A flap or edge, as of a counter.

What brave spirit could be content to sit in his shop, with a flappet of wood and a blue apron before him, selling mithridatum and dragons-water to visited houses, that might nurse fates of arms? Beau. and FL., Knight of Burning Pestle, i. 3.

flappish (flap'ish), a. [flap + -ish.] Disposed to flap; in active irregular motion.

I see your keys! see a fool's head of your own; had I kept them I warrant they had been forthcoming; you are so flappish, you throw 'em up and down at your tail. Sir R. Howard, The Committee, iv.

flaptail (flap'tāl), n. An American monkey the tail of which is not prehensile; distinguished from clutchtail.

flap-tile (flap'til), n. A tile a part of which is bent up to form a corner or receive a drip.

flap-valve (flap'valv), n. A clack-valve; a valve hinged on one side.

flare (flâr), v.; pret. and pp. flared, ppr. flaring. [Of Scand. origin: < Norw. flara, blaze, flame, adorn with tinsel, = Sw. dial. flara upp, blaze up suddenly (cf. E. flare up); the older form (with orig. s) in Sw. dial. flusa, burn furiously, blaze; see flash.] 1. intrans. 1. To shine out with sudden and unsteady light, luster, or splendor; give out a dazzling light.

When the sun begins to fling
His flaring beams. Milton, Il Penseroso, l. 132.

2. To waver; flutter; burn with an unsteady light, as flame in a current of air; hence, to flutter, as such flame does; flutter with gaudy show.

With ribbons pendant, flaring 'bout her head. Shak., M. W. of W., iv. 6.

Like flaring tapers, brightening as they waste. Goldsmit, Traveller, l. 400.

Our last light, that long Had wink'd and threaten'd darkness, flared and fell. Templeton, Morte d'Arthur.

3. To open or spread outward, like the mouth of a trumpet.—4. To incline outward from a perpendicular, as a ship's sides or bows, or any similar formation; opposed to tumble home. To flare up, to burn high by a sudden impulse; hence, to become suddenly angry or excited; fly into a passion.

Crime will not fail to flare up from men's hearts
While hearts are men's, and so born criminal. Broening, Ring and Book, l. 102.

II. trans. To cause to burn with a flaring flame; hence, to display glaringly; exhibit in an ostentatious manner.

One mortal, one nation or generation of mortals, may flare a flambeau, and another twinkle a taper. Sir W. Hamilton.

flare (flâr), n. 1. A glaring, unsteady, wavering light; a glare; as, the flare of an expiring candle.

In the hollow down by the flare. Dickens, Our Mutual Friend, l. 31.

2. A spreading outward; a terminal or a continuous broadening, as of a trumpet or a lily, the side of a vessel of any kind, etc.—3. In photog., same as ghost, 8.

Flare or ghost in the camera is an indistinct image of the diaphragm. Len, Photography, p. 91.

4. Ostentation.

Too modest for business push and flare, he kept in the background while others gained by his labor. Sec. Amer., N. S., LVIII. 21.

Syn. 1. Glare, etc. See flame, n.

flare-tin (flâr'tin), n. Same as flash-pan, 2.

There was a flare-tin aboard, and from time to time we burned this over the rail, the turpentine making a great glare that illuminated the brig from the eyes to the tall rail. W. C. Russell, Jack's Courtship, xvi.

flare-up (flâr'up), n. [flare up, verb phrase, q. v., under flare, v.] 1. A sudden flashing or flaring of flame or light.—2. A sudden quarrel or angry argument. [Colloq.]

flaring (flâr'ing), p. a. 1. Blazing; burning unsteadily.—2. Gaudy; showy; flashy.

Her chaste and modest veil, surrounded with celestial beams, they overlaid with wanton tresses, and in a flaring tin bespeckled her with all the gaudy adornments of a whoreson. Milton, Reformation in Eng., i.

flaringly (flâr'ing li), adv. Flutteringly; showily.

flash¹ (flash), v. [The several words spelled flash are somewhat confused with one another. *Flash*¹, v., is prob. of Scand. origin; Sw. dial. flasa, burn furiously, blaze; see flare, v.] 1. intrans. 1. To burst into sudden flame; specifically, to ignite and flare up with sudden and transient brilliancy; emit a bright flame for a moment; as, the flashing-point of oil; the powder flashed in the pan.

Whereof cometh that horrible and broad flashing flame of tyre? It spronge of one litel sparke. J. Udall, On Jas. iii.

The quality of an oil may be tested by chemical analysis; by measurement of density and viscosity; by observation of the temperature necessary for ignition in the atmosphere, or, as it is called, the flashing temperature. Encyc. Brit., XV. 35.

2. To burst forth with sudden brilliancy; break out in a transient or variable gleam or glitter; emit flashes; gleam; as, the lightning flashed continually.

Lord Timon will be left a naked gull,
Which flashes now a phoenix. Shak., T. of A., ii. 1.

There the lake
Spread its blue sheet that flashed with many an oar. Bryant, The Ages, st. 30.

His gray eyes
Flashing with fire of warlike memories. William Morris, Earthly Paradise, l. 423.

3. To burst suddenly into view or perception; come or appear instantaneously; as, the scene flashed upon his sight; the solution of the problem flashed into his mind.

Upon me flash'd
The power of prophesying. Tennyson, Tiresias.
Then flash the wings returning Summer calls
Through the deep arches of her forest halls. O. W. Holmes, Spring.

4. To burst suddenly into action; break out with sudden force or violence.

Every hour
He flashes into one gross crime or other,
That sets us all at odds. Shak., Lear, i. 3.

For while he linger'd there,
A doubt that ever smouldered in the hearts
Of those great Lords and Barons of his realm Flash'd forth and into war. Tennyson, Coming of Arthur.

5. To come, move, or pass in a flashing manner; act as if in or by a flash; as, the dog flashed by in hot pursuit.

Eider-ducks flashed out of the water, the father of the family as usual the first to fly, and leaving wife and children to take care of themselves. Froude, Sketches, p. 71.

6. In glass-making, to expand, as blown glass, into a disk. See *flashing*¹, 1.—To flash in the pan. (a) To flash and go out so suddenly as not to ignite the charge; said of the powder in the pan of a flint-lock firearm when fired ineffectually, and also of the arm itself. (b) Hence, to fail after a showy or pretensions effort; act or strive without result; give up suddenly without accomplishing anything.

II. trans. 1. To emit or send forth in a sudden flash or flashes; cause to appear with sudden glitter.

But now her cheek was pale, and by and by
It flash'd forth fire, as lightning from the sky. Shak., Venus and Adonis, l. 348.

The chariot of paternal Deity, Flashing thick flames. Milton, P. L., vi. 751.

2. To cause to flame up suddenly, as by ignition; produce a flash from.

A small portion [of gunpowder] is roughly granulated, and flashed on plates of glass or porcelain. Encyc. Brit., XI. 325.

3. To convey or send by instantaneous communication; cause to appear or be perceived suddenly or startlingly; as, to flash a message over the wires (of a telegraph).

Then suddenly regain the prize,
And flash thanksgivings to the skies. Cooper, Annus Memorabilis.

For so the words were flash'd into his heart,
He knew not whence or wherefore. Tennyson, Pelleas and Ettarre.

4. To cause to appear flashy; trick up in a showy manner; streak; stripe. [Rare.]

Limning and flashing it with various dyes. A. Brewer, Lingua, l. 1.

5. In glass-making, to expand to a flat disk, as the blown globe or mass of glass, by revolving it in front of the furnace-mouth, which keeps it hot and ductile; hence, to apply a film of colored glass to by this process. See *flashing*¹, 1.

There is a kind of coloured glass made by having a thin stratum of coloured glass melted or flashed on one side of an ordinary sheet of clear glass. Ves. Diet., II. 208.

On the other hand, extreme brilliancy of surface, ascribed by some to the effect of the flashing furnace, is a characteristic of this [crown] glass. Glass making, p. 126.

6. In electric lighting, to make (the carbon filament) incandescent. See *flashing*¹, 3. Flashed glass, colored glass for windows and the like, produced by the process of flashing. See *flashing*¹, 1 (c).

flash¹ (flash), n. [*< flash*¹, v.] 1. n. 1. A sudden burst of flame or light; a light instantaneously appearing and disappearing; a gleam: as, a flash from a gun.

The living creatures ran and returned as the appearance of a flash of lightning. Ezek., i. 14.

Gui. Fear no more the lightning flash;
Are. Nor the all-dreaded thunder-stone.
Shak., Cymbeline, iv. 2 (song).

Wit shoots in vain its momentary fires,
The meteor drops, and in a flash expires.
Pope, Dunciad, iv. 631.

What strikes the crown of tyrants down,
And answers with its flash their brow?
The Sword. M. J. Lauro.

2. A sudden burst of something regarded as resembling light in its effect, as color, wit, glee, energy, passion, etc.; a short, vivid, and brilliant outburst; a momentary brightness or show.

The flash and out-break of a fiery mind;
A savageness in unreclaimed blood.
Shak., Hamlet, ii. 1.

Where be . . . your flashes of merriment, that were wont to set the table on a roar?
Shak., Hamlet, v. 1.

But if so great a flash of joy and prosperity . . . should make them grow wanton and extravagant, what course then so likely to reclaim them as a series of smart and severe judgments one upon another?

Stillington, Sermons, I. xi.

A flash of color like a flame passed over her face.
Mrs. Oliphant, Poor Gentleman, xxvii.

3. The time occupied by a flash of light; a very short period; a transient state; an instant.

The Persians and Macedonians had it for a flash.
Racon.

The height of whose [earth's] enchanting pleasure
Is but a flash?
Quarles, Emblems, ii. 5.

4. pl. The hot stage of a fever. [Prov. Eng.] —5. fl. A showy or blustering person.

The town is full
Of these vain-glorious flashes.
Shirley, Love in a Maze, i. 2.

Fanatics, and declamatory flashes.
Milton, Reformation in Eng., i.

6. A quibble; jugglery with words.

He falls next to flashes, and a multitude of words, in all which is contained no more than what might be the plea of any guiltiest offender.
Milton, Eikonoklastes, xii.

7. A shoot of a plant.

The new shoots [of the tea-plant], or flashes, as they are called, come on four, sometimes five times between April and October.

A. G. F. Eliot James, Indian Industries, xxviii.

8. A preparation of capsicum, burnt sugar, etc., used for coloring brandy and rum, and giving them a facitious strength. A flash in the pan. (a) An explosion of the priming in the lock-pan, the gun itself hanging fire. Hence—(b) An unsuccessful effort or outburst; a brilliant endeavor followed by failure; said of an utterly abortive effort that has been made with much parade or confidence, of an ineffective outbreak of passion, etc.—Flash-fuse. See *flash*¹, = Syn. 1. Flare, etc. See flame, n.

flash² (flash), v. [Also dial. flash; < ME. flaskien, flaskien, dash (water), sprinkle. See extract. Origin uncertain; an OE. flasque*, with sense of OE. and F. flaque, dash or throw water, etc., does not occur, but is suggested by the analogy of *flash*³, n., < OE. flache, with equiv. flasque, and flaque, mod. F. flaque, a pool; see *flash*³, n. In mod. use *flash*² is merged in *flash*¹. Cf. *flash*², v. 4.] 1. trans. 1*t.* To dash (water); sprinkle.

So schal the thet schriveth him, . . . gif dust of lihte thouhtes windeþ to swithe [too much], flaskie teares on him. . . . O the smale dust [on the fine dust], gif hit dusteti swithe, heo flasheth water thereon and swopeth hit ut [sweepeth it out].
Ancient Rible, p. 314.

2. To splash; dash about, as water.

With his raging arms he rudely flash'd
The waves about, and all his armour swept,
That all the blood and filth away was wash'd.
Spenser, F. Q.

3. To increase the flow of water in; flood with water from a reservoir or otherwise, as a stream or a sewer; flush. See *flushing*².

II. intrans. To splash, as waves.

The sea flushed up unto his legs and knees.

Holbrooke, Hist. Eng., p. 181.

flash³ (flash), n. [Also dial. flash; < ME. flasche, flasche, flassche, flasche, flessu, also, without assimilation, flask, a pool of water. < OE. flache, also flasque, and, without assimilation, flac, flaque, a pool, puddle, ditch, estuary. < OD. clack, an estuary, flats with stagnant pools. < clack, D. clak = OHG. flah, G. flach, flat, level; cf. OSlav. plasku, flat.] 1. A pool of water.

Flasche or flasche, where reyne watyr standy the, torrens, lacuna.

Prompt. Booke, p. 493.

Yet still the dangerous dykes from shot do them secure,
Where they [muskettars, etc.] from flash to flash, like the full epicure.

Wait, as they lov'd to change their diet every meal.

Deighton, Polyolicon, xvi.

2. A sluice or lock on a navigable river, just above a shoal, to raise the water while craft are passing.

I was gone down with the barge to London; and for want of a flash, we lay ten weeks before we came again.
Dunlop on Oxford Parliament, 161 (Hart. Misc., II. 116).

3. [Prob. with allusion to *flash*¹.] A body of water driven by violence. To make a flash, to let boats down through a lock. (Eng.)

flash⁴ (flash), a. [Origin uncertain; prob. *< flash*¹, v.] Insipid; vapid.

Loath I am to mingle philosophical cordials with pin-vine, as water with wine, lest my consolation should be flash and dilute.
S. Ward, Sermons, p. 63.

flash⁵ (flash), a. [Generally derived from *flash*¹, with which the sense of 'vulgarily showy or gaudy,' equiv. to *flashy*¹, which is the prop. adj. of *flash*¹, is now associated; but prob. of different, though obscure, origin. See extract from Isaac Taylor.] 1. Of or pertaining to or associated with thieves, knaves, vagabonds, prostitutes, etc.; applied especially to thieves' cant or jargon.

Many persons have confused the low gibberish in vogue with thieves and mendicants called flash with the Roman; but that idea is absurdly wrong.

N. and Q., 6th ser., IX. 504.

In a wild district of Derbyshire, between Macclesfield and Buxton, there is a village called Flash, surrounded by unimproved land. The squatters on these commons, with their wild zipsy habits, travelled about the neighbourhood from far to far, using a slang dialect of their own. They were called the Flash men, and their dialect Flash talk, and it is not difficult to see the stages by which the word Flash has reached its present significance.

Isaac Taylor.

2. Vulgarly showy or gaudy; as, a flash dress; a flash style.

The hotel does not assert itself very loudly, and if occasionally transient guests appear with flash manners, they do not affect the general tone of the region.

C. D. Warner, Their Pilgrimage, p. 157.

3. Expert; smart; crack. [Slang.]

The flash riders, or horse breakers, always called "bronco busters," can perform really marvelous feats, riding with ease the most vicious and unbroken beasts.

T. Russell, The Century, XXXV. 507.

Flash language, thieves' cant; thieves' slang.

He gives a very interesting catalogue of some seventy words in the thieves' parson, or flash language, which is thus shown to have come to this country in the last century.

Harpers's Mag., LXXVI. 611.

Flash notes, forged or counterfeit notes.

flasher¹ (flash'er), n. [*< flash*¹ + -er.] 1. One who or that which flashes. Specially—2. One who makes a show of more wit than he possesses.

They are reckoned the flashers of the place; yet everybody laughs at them for their airs, affectations, and tonish graces and impertinences. Mae, D. Arden, Diary, I. 260.

3. A hot boiler into which water is injected in small quantities and flashed into steam by the heat.—4. A rower.—5. In ichthy., an acanthopterygian fish, the tripletail, Lobohs surinamensis, of the family Lobotidae (which see); any lobotid.

flasher² (dash'er), n. [See flasher.] Same as flasher.

flash-house (dash'hous), n. [*< flash*⁵ + house.] A house frequented by thieves, vagabonds, and prostitutes, and in which stolen goods are received.

The excesses of that age [time of Charles II.] remind us of the humours of a gang of footpads, revelling with their favourite beauties at a flash-house.

Munday, Hallam's Const. Hist.

flashily (dash'i-li), adv. In a flashy manner; with sudden glare or force; without solidity of wit or thought; with gaudy or ostentatious show.

flashiness¹ (dash'i-nes), n. [*< flashy*¹ + -ness.] The state of being flashy; ostentatious gaudiness.

flashiness² (dash'i-nes), n. [*< flashy*² + -ness.] Tastelessness; vapidness; insipidity.

The same experiment may be made in artichokes and other seeds, when you would take away either their flashiness or bitterness.

Bacon, Nat. Hist.

flashing¹ (dash'ing), n. [Verbal n. of *flash*¹, v.]

1. In glass-making: (a) The reheating of partially formed glassware in a flashing-furnace to restore the plastic condition, and to smooth rough edges. (b) The act or process of heating a globe of blown glass, and giving it a rapid rotary motion, so that the opening already made in it will widen till the globe flashes suddenly into a flat disk. (c) A mode of coating a globe of hot colorless glass with a film of colored glass, usually red, and blowing them together until they flash into a disk. Such glass is called flashed glass or doubled glass, and is used for decorative purposes, as in glass painting and glass staining, of the richest as well as plainest sorts; also to give alternation of color by grinding away the color in a design or pattern.

2. In arch., pieces of lead, zinc, or other metal, used to protect the joining when a roof comes in contact with a wall, or when a chimney-shaft or other object comes through a roof, and the like. The metal is let into a joint or groove cut in the wall, etc., and tumbled down so as to lap over the joining. When the flashing is tumbled down over the upturned edge of the lead of a gutter, it is in Scotland called an apen.

3. In the manufacture of incandescent lamps, the operation of raising the carbon filament to incandescence in an atmosphere of coal-gas, for the purpose of hardening and smoothing the carbons, and equalizing their resistance. flashing² (dash'ing), n. [*< flash*³, n., + -ing.] The act of creating an artificial flood in a conduit or stream, as in a sewer for cleansing it, or at shallows in a river by penning up the water either in the river itself or in side reservoirs. See flushing.

flashing-board (dash'ing-board), n. A device for increasing the depth or force of a stream of water by diminishing its width, as a board set up on edge on the top of a mill-dam when the stream is low.

flashing-bottle (dash'ing-bot'l), n. A glass vessel in which carbon filaments for incandescent lamps are flashed. See *flashing*¹, 3.

flashing-furnace (dash'ing-fur-nas), n. A reheating glass-furnace. See *flashing*¹, 1.

flashing-point (dash'ing-point), n. The temperature at which escaping vapor will ignite momentarily, or flash; distinguished from the burning-point, at which the substance will itself take fire and burn: usually said of oils or hydrocarbons. Also flash-point.

As the oil appeared to have taken fire with extraordinary rapidity, it was assumed, in the first instance, that the flashing-point was below the parliamentary standard.

Proc. Inst., IV. 550.

flash-light (dash'lit), n. 1. A light so arranged as to emit sudden brilliant gleams, lasting but a short time: used for military signals and in lighthouses. See lighthouse.

A flash-light: that is to say, one which can be made to glow or disappear at pleasure. Sci. Amer., N. S., LIV. 16.

2. A preparation emitting when ignited a sudden and very brilliant light, used in taking instantaneous photographs at night or in a room insufficiently lighted by natural light, etc. It usually consists chiefly of a magnesium powder, sometimes in combination with gun cotton.

flashman (dash'man), n.; pl. flashmen (-men). [*< flash*³ + man.] A knave, especially one who tries to appear as a gentleman. [Slang.]

You're playing a dangerous game, my flashman. . . . I've shot a man down for less than that.

H. Kinsley, Geoffrey Hamlyn, v.

flash-pan (dash'pan), n. 1. The receptacle in a flint-lock which holds the priming by which the charge is exploded. See cut under flint-lock.—2. A small copper pan with a handle, in which powder is flashed as a signal. Also called flare-pan.

flash-pipe (dash'pip), n. A gas-pipe perforated throughout with small holes, used in lighting gas-burners. It has a stopcock, on turning which gas is emitted from each orifice, and when one of these small jets is lighted the flame flashes along the pipe and lights the burners connected with it. When the stopcock is closed the small jets are extinguished.

flash-point (dash'point), n. Same as flashing-point.

Young's Company now manufacture a lighted seal of 150 Fahr. flash-point. Proc. Inst., IV. 550.

flash-test (dash'test), n. A test to determine the flashing-point of kerosene or other volatile oil.

flash-torch (dash'torch), n. Theat., a device by which the fine powdery spores of lycopodium are driven through flame to produce the effect of lightning.

flash-wheel (dash'hweel), n. A water-raising wheel having arms radial, or nearly so, to its axle, as in the common paddle-wheel. It is set in a trough containing water, nearly fitting it throughout one quarter or less of its circumference, and raises the water from the level of its lower side to greater elevation.

flashy¹ (dash'i), a. [*< flash*¹ + -y.] 1. Like a flash; characterized by flashes or flashing; specifically, acting by flashes, or by fits and starts; quick; impulsive; fiery. [Now rare in this literal sense.]

But sometimes so shaken by these shallows with the fear of flashy lightness that they become empty or bring forth feeble young ones.

Holland, tr. of Ammianus, p. 239.

Thus spake the ladie, who in this meanwhile
With light-heeled flashy haste the horse o'ertook.
Pearce, tr. of Virgil (1632).

The very attempt towards pleasing every body discover ers a temper always flashy, and often false and insincere.
Bacon, Speech at Bristol.

2. Showy; dazzling for a moment, but not lasting, solid, or real; meretricious.

Flashy with a mixed tation the whole extent of a large discourse.
See K. Dugby, Nature of Man's Soul.

A sound and steady judgment (which rarely goes in company with subtle and flashy imaginations) is the most useful and commanding ability in business.

See Pearce, Platonick Theol. (2d ed.), p. 29.

1. In looks upon them as men of superficial learning and flashy parts.
Addison, Tom Folio.

As stories, these were cheap and flashy.

The Century, XXVI, 295.

as, a flask for wine. (b) A small (often of other portable) glass bottle with flat sides; as, a pocket-flask. (c) A vessel, generally of metal or horn, for containing gunpowder, carried by sportsmen, usually furnished with a measure of the charge at the top. (d) An iron vessel for containing mercury, in the shape of a long bottle. A flask of mercury from California is about 75 pounds. (e) A vessel used in a laboratory for sublim-ation, for digesting in a sand-bath or for any similar purpose.

2. A shallow frame of wood or iron used in foundries to contain the sand and patterns employed in molding and casting. If the mold is contained in two pieces, these form a two-part flask. The upper part holds the case or cope, and the lower the drag. Also mold's flask, mold's flask.

3. A bed in a gun-carriage. — 4. A long narrow case, as for arrows; a quiver; hence, a set of arrows in a quiver.

Here sitting quiver at her shoulders hung,
There in a flask of arrow, sheathed her will.

Percy, tr. of Tasso, XI, 1.

Florence flask, a globular bottle of thin transparent glass, with a narrow neck, usually covered with platinum foil, or other material, used for holding liquid of all kinds. The flask commonly known by the name that in which chemical reagents are often exported from Italy, and which is used in the laboratory, is a Florence flask, and is named after Florence, where it was first made.

flasket, a small flask, dim. of flasket, a flask;
see flasket and flasket (2)]. 1. A small flask, especially one for powder; probably same as moving-horn. — 2. A vessel in which viands are served. — 3. A long shallow basket.

And each one had a little wicker basket,
Made of fine twigs, entangled curiously,
In which they gathered flowers to fill their flasket.
Spenser, Prothalamion.

Under his arm a little wicker flasket.

R. Jonson, Masque of Hymen.

flask-shaped (flask'shap't), a. Shaped like a flask; specifically, round, partly cylindrical, and swelling into a more or less globular form at one end.

flasque (flask), n. [F.] In her., a bearing imilar to the flanch, but less rounded and occupying less of the field. Also called vider.

flat (flat), a. and n. [I. a. Early mod. E. also adj.] I. a. 1. Lying all in one plane; without rotundity, curvature, or other variation or inequality; plane; specifically, in math., having no curvature; homoloidal; having the locus of infinitely distant points linear; applied to space of any number of dimensions. In the common use of the word, levelness or horizontality is often implied.

Flat meads thatch'd with stover.
Shak., Tempest, iv. 1.

Thou, all-shaking thunder,
Strike flat the thick rotundity o' the world!

Shak., Lear, iii. 2.

Virtue could see to do what virtue would
By her own radiant light, though sun and moon
Were in the flat sea sunk. Milton, Comus, l. 575.

The bente Earl . . . unknighly, with flat hand,
However lightly, smote her on the cheek.
Tennyson, Geraint.

2. Prostrate; lying the whole length on the ground; level with the ground; hence, fallen; laid low; ruined.

The people are flat, or trust in God, and the king's ways.
Donne, Letters, lxxi.

3. Having little or no relief; deficient in prominence or roundness of figure or feature; lacking contrast in appearance, whether physical or visual; smooth; even; without shading; as, flat tints; a flat painting; a flat face, nose, or head; flat cheeks.

Whatever man he be that hath a blemish, he shall not approach; a blind man, or a lame, or he that hath a flat nose.
Lev., xxi. 18.

oured with bright flat tints.

C. C. Peckins, Italian Sculpture, Int., p. xliii.

The gray-green landscape of Provence is never absolutely flat, and yet is never really ambitious. . . . It is in constant modulation. H. James, Jr., Little Tour, p. 202.

4. Having no definite or characteristic taste;
tasteless; stale; vapid; insipid; dead.

Taste so divine, that what of sweet before Hath touch'd my sense flat seems to this, and harsh.
Milton, P. L., ix. 987.

Most ample fruit
Of beauteous form, . . . pleasing to sight,
But to the tongue inelegant and flat.
J. Phillips, Cider.

The cause of the beer becoming flat may be found in the ceasing of after fermentation.

Thomson, Beer (trans.), p. 689.

5. Having little or no interest or attractive quality; without briskness or animation; lacking activity; stupid; dull.

Reading good books of morality is a little flat and dead.
Bacon, Friendship (ed. 1887).

How weary, stale, flat, and unprofitable
Seem to me all the uses of this world!

Shak., Hamlet, i. 2.

Nay, I entreat you, be not so flat and melancholic.
R. Jonson, Cynthia's Revels, iii. 1.

Doubtless many things appear flat to us, the wit which depended on some custom or story which never came to our knowledge. Dequien, Essay on Dram. Poetry.

I have added four more "Worlds," the second of which with I think, to my last Chesterfield's character with you for wit except in the two stories, which are very flat.

Walpole, Letters, II, 411.

6. Not relieved, broken, or softened by qualifications or conditions; peremptory; absolute; positive; downright.

To the true ball-mocking of justice it is a flat wrong to punish the thought or purpose of one before it be enacted.

Spenser, State of Ireland.

That in the captain's but a choleric word
Which in the soldier is flat blasphemy.

Shak., M. for M., ii. 2.

I'll not march through Coventry with them, that's flat.
Shak., 1 Hen. IV., iv. 2.

Thus repulsed, our final hope
Is flat despair. Milton, P. L., ii. 143.

A man deem'd worthy of so dear a trust . . .
A flat and fatal negative obtains
That instant upon all his future pains.

Cooper, Trovatore, I, 714.

7. Not clear, precise, or sonorous; as, a flat sound or accent.

The first seems shorter than the later, who shewes a more aduense than the former by reason of his sharpe accent which is upon the last syllable, and makes him more audible then if he had slid away with a flat accent, as the word swerling. Pattenham, Arte of Eng. Poetrie, p. 59.

Too flat I thought this voice, and that too shrill.
Praor, Solomon, ii.

8. In music: (a) Of tones, below a given or intended pitch.

Nay, now you are too flat,
And mar the concord with too harsh a descant.
Shak., T. G. of V., i. 2.

(b) Of intervals, minor; diminished; as, a flat fifth. (c) Of keys or tonalities, having flats in the signature; as, the key of F is a flat key. —
9. In gram., voiced or sonant; said of consonants, such as b, d, g, z, v: opposed to sharp (that is, breathed or surd) consonants, such as p, t, k, s, f. — 10. On the stock exchange, without interest; applied to stocks when no interest is allowed by a lender of them on the sum deposited with him as security for their return when the purpose for which the stock was borrowed has been accomplished: such stock is said to be borrowed flat. — Flat arch. See arch. — Flat blade, a double- or single-edged blade, as of a sword or saber; used in contradistinction to the three-edged blade of the small-sword. — Flat calm, candle- stick, cap, chasing, file, etc. See the nouns. — Flat

II. n. 1. A flat surface; a surface without curvature or inequality; especially, a level plain;
a field.

The rayn . . . Falls upon fayre flat.
Sir Guyard and the Green Knight (E. E. T. S.), l. 506.

No perfect discovery can be made upon a flat or level.

Bacon, Advancement of Learning, i. 55.

On the Crown of this craggy Hill there is a Flat, upon which the Monastery and Pilgrimage-place is founded.

Howell, Letters, I, i. 23.

The way is ready, and not long;
Beyond a row of myrtles, on a flat,
Fast by a fountain. Milton, P. L., iv. 627.

2. A level ground near water or covered by shallow water; a shoal or sand-bank; specifically, in the United States, a low alluvial plain near tide-water or along a river, as the Jersey (United States) or Mohawk flats; also, the part of a shore that is uncovered at low tide.

I should not see the sandy hour-glass run,
But I should think of shallows and of flats.

Shak., M. of V., i. 1.

They landed . . . and had much a doe to put a shore any wher, it lay so full of flats.

Bradford, Plymouth Plantation, p. 83.

The naked shore,
Wide flats, where nothing but coarse grasses grew.
Tennyson, Holy Grail.

3. The flat part or side of anything, as the extended palm and fingers of the hand, the broad side of a sword or knife, the part of a panel included by the bending or molding, etc.; as, to strike with the flat of the hand, or of a sword.

It is easier to tell when the cutting edge and the flat are parallel and the broad flat is the best guide in holding the chisel level with the surface to be chipped.

J. Rose, Practical Machinist, p. 257.

The flats of panels are finished in imitation of mosaic, having a conventional border of deep blue and dull blue, and a design of acanthus form in the centres, in lighter blue, pink, and venetian red tones upon a gold mosaic background. Beck's Jour. Dec. Art, II, 343.

4. Something broad and flat in form, or presenting a broad flat surface as a characteristic feature. (a) A broad flat-bottomed boat without a keel, generally used in river navigation. (b) A railroad-car without a roof or sides; a platform car; a flat-car. (c) A broad brimmed, low-crowned straw hat worn by women.
(d) A piece of bone, etc., used for making buttons. (e) A flat piece of carding placed above the cylinder of a carder;
the flat-top carder. (f) A flat form of mud used in picture-frames.

There are several small drawings of Turner's in the present Exhibition greatly injured by the very modern-looking deep gold flats brought close up to them.

Nineteenth Century, XIX, 400.

5. A foolish person; a simpleton; one who is easily duped; a gull. [Colloq.]

"You did not seek a partner in the peerage, Mr. Newcome." "No, no, not such a confounded flat as that," cries Mr. Newcome.

Thackeray, Newcomes, vii.

6. In arch: (a) See flat². (b) A horizontal or approximately horizontal roof, usually, in northern climates, covered with lead or tin.

7. In music: (a) A tone one half-step below a given tone; as, the flat of B—that is, B flat. (b) On the pianoforte, with reference to any given key, the key next below or to the left. The black keys are often called sharps and flats, because always named by reference to neighboring white keys, but B and E are also called C flat and F flat respectively. (c)

In musical notation, the character b, which when attached to a note or to a staff-degree lowers its significance one half-step. See Evolutionum, under B.—8. In ship-building, formerly, one of the midship timbers.—9. In theaters, one of the halves of such scenes or parts of scenes as are formed by two equal parts pushed from the sides of the stage and meeting in the center.—

10. In mining, in the lead-mining districts of the north of England, a lateral branching of the vein, which gives rise to a deposit, as of ore, in flat masses. The excavations in these are sometimes several yards in breadth, and they are not infrequently connected with caverns, the sides of which are incrustated with beautiful crystallizations of the veinstones peculiar to that region. Deposits of ore lying horizontally or nearly so are also, in other mining districts, called flats. This is the case in Denbighshire, Wales, and also in Cornwall, where the flat parts of the "pipes" and "carbons" are often designated as flats.

11. A surface of size put over gilding.—12. A continuum of any number of dimensions having no curvature; such as a straight line, a plane, and Euclidean space.—13. Flat opposition or contradiction; a point-blank assertion or denial.

He thought with bantling brave to keep the coyle,
Or else with flatts and facings mee to foil.

Mr. for Mays.

Deck-flat (unnt.), a platform or deck of iron or steel, either water-tight or not, but not a complete deck.—Double flat, in music. (a) A tone two half-steps lower than a given tone; the flat of a flat. (b) On the pianoforte, a key next but one below or to the left of a given key. (c) The character b, which when attached to a note or to a staff-degree lowers its significance two half-steps.

flat¹ (flat), v.; pret. and pp. flatted, pp. flattening. [< flat², a.] 1. trans. 1t. To make flat; level or bring to a level; lay even; make smooth; flatten.

Then frothy white appear the flatted seas,
And change their colour, changing their disease.

Dryden, Ceyx and Alecyon, l. 131.

A Face too long should part and flat the Hair Congress, tr. of Ovid's Art of Love.

2t. To level with the ground; overthrow.

Like a Phœbean champion, she [Virtue] hath routed the army of her enemies, flatted their strongest forts.

Pelham, Resolves, l. 4.

3. To make vapid or tasteless.

Otherwise fresh in their colour, but their juice somewhat flatted.

Bacon, Nat. Hist.

It may be apprehended that the retrenchment of these pleasant liberties may flat and dead the taste of conversation.

W. Montague, Devout Essays, l. xii, § 3.

It mortifies the body, and flatts the pleasure of the senses.

Glauville, Sermons, p. 279.

4. In music, to depress (a tone); specifically, to apply a flat to (a note or staff-degree)—that is, to depress it a half-step. Also flatten.—5. To decorate or paint with colors ground in linseed-oil, and thinned for use with turpentine. The turpentine kills the gloss of the oil, and the resulting surface appears dull or flat.

A frieze of massive carton pierre, supporting trusses at intervals, is flatted in tones of fawn color and buff.

Beck's Jour. Dec. Art, II, 343.

To flat in the sail (unnt.), to draw in the aftmost clew of a sail toward the middle of the ship.

And flaths on his face. Poes Phœbus (U), vii, 58.

II. intrans. To dash; rush.

They were at great mischance, for the seasons were so many that the most flat in to the foreste wode they or moon, for as soon as the kyngs olney was come, he kepte hem so shorte that many were deyd and taken.

Morton (E. E. T. S.), ii, 275.

flat⁴, n. [ME. < OP. flat, a blow; see flat³, v.] A blow.

He gaff Richard a sorry flatt.

That touchyd berynt and hat.

Richard Cœur de Lion, l. 5265.

Swich a flat! Arthur and Merlin, p. 182. (Halliwell.)

flat¹ (flat), v. t. [< OP. flater, flatter; see flatter².] To flatter. [Scotch.] flatbill (flat'bīl), n. 1. A bird of the family Troglodytes; as, the green flatbill, Todus viridis.—2. Some other flat-billed bird, as a flycatcher of the genus Platyrhynchus.

Flata (flat'a), n. [NL. < L. flatus, pp. of flare = E. blow¹.] The typical genus of wax-producing bugs, with semicircular wings, of the family Flatidae. E. flabata, an Indian species, is an example of a grass-green color varied with bright red and pure white, and with wings expanding nearly two inches.

flatboat (flat'bōt), n. A flat-bottomed boat of considerable size, roughly made of strong timbers, for floating merchandise, etc., down the Mississippi and other western rivers. Such boats were in early times the principal means of transportation by water, and are not yet entirely obsolete. At the end of the downward voyage they are broken up and their material is sold. [U. S.]

About fifty years ago, Abraham Lincoln was polling a flatboat on the Mississippi River. The American, VI, 40.

flat-breasted (flat'bres'ted), a. Having a flat breast; specifically, in ornith., ratite; not carinate; having no keel of the breast-bone.

flat-cap (flat'kăp), n. A cap with a low flat crown. Especially (a) A city flat cap. See city, a.

Flat caps as proper are to city gowns

As to armour helmets, or to kings their crowns.

Dickens, Honest Whore, ii, 1.

How says that, in the times of Mary and Elizabeth, "apprentices wore flat caps, and others under three-score years of age, as well journey-men as masters, both at home and abroad, whom the pages of the court, in derision, called flat caps."

Gifford, Note to E. Jonson's Every Man in his Humour, ii, 1.

Hence—(b) A person wearing such a cap.

Wealthy flat-caps that pay for their pleasure the best of any men in Europe. Marsden, Dutch Courtesan, ii, 1.

(c) Less commonly, the toque worn by both men and women of the wealthier classes in the sixteenth century.

flat-car (flat'kîr), n. A railroad-car consisting of a platform without sides or top; a platform-car.

flat-clam (flat'klam), n. Scote devisa, an edible species of clam. [California, U. S.] flate (flat), v. t.; pret. and pp. flated, pp. flattening. [< L. flatus, pp. of flare, breathe, blow = E. blow¹.] To produce with flatus, or with simple unintonated breath. [Rare.] flatfish (flat'fîsh), n. Any fish of the suborder Actinopterygii; so called from the flattened bilaterally symmetrical form. The body is greatly compressed, and on one side is colorless or whitish, while the other is dark and variously marked. The typical flatfishes constitute the family Pleuronectidae and include many species of great economic importance as the halibut, turbot, plaice, sole, flounder, etc. A flatfish is not really flat (that is, depressed or flattened out horizontally), but is, on the contrary, thin (that is, extremely compressed or vertically expanded), and has both eyes on one side, not on top. It swims and lies with its cyphes and colorless side downward, thus appearing as if spread out horizontally.

flat-footed (flat'füt'ed), a. 1. Having flat feet; having little or no hollow in the sole, and a low arch in the instep.—2. Firm-footed; resolute. [Slang.]

He Mr. . . . should come out flat-footed, call himself a dealer, instead of posing as an "art lecturer."

The American.

flathead (flat'hed), a. and n. I. a. 1. Having an artificially flattened head; applied to certain American Indians. The deformity is produced in infancy by appliances causing pressure upon the skull from before backward (the more common method, making it flat and receding in front and protuberant behind, or from above downward, making it flat at the top). It disappears partially or wholly with advance of age, and is said not to injure the intellect. The practice now survives chiefly in the northwest, but was formerly common over both North and South America.

2. [cap.] Pertaining to the tribe of Indians specifically called Flatheads. See II., 1.

II. n. 1. [cap.] One of a small tribe of American Indians specifically so called, but erroneously, their heads not being flattened, and their true name being Salish. The original home of the Flatheads was in the valley of the Columbia river, but a part of them now live on a reservation in northwestern Montana. They are all nominally Christianized and civilized.

2. A dipnoan fish, Ceratodus forsteri. [Australia.]
3. A snake which flattens its head, as a species of Heterodon; the hog-nosed snake or puff-adder. [Local, U. S.]

The blow snake of Illinois is variously known in other localities as hog-nose, flat-head, viper, and puff-adder.

Pop. Sci. Mo., XXXIII, 649.

flat-headed (flat'hed'ed), a. Having a flat head or top.

This [church] bears date 1477, as appears from an inscription over one of its doors. But this doorway is flat-headed, and has lost all medieval character.

E. A. Freeman, Venice, p. 216.

flat-house (flat'hous), n. [< flat² + house.] A house containing a number of flats. [U. S.] flatid (flat'id), n. One of the Flatida.

Flatida (flat'i-dî), n. pl. [NL. < Flata + -ida.] Same as Flatida, considered as a subfamily of Fulgoroidea. Also Flatides.

Flatidæ (flat'i-dê), n. pl. [NL. < Flata + -idæ.] A family of homopterous hemipterous insects, of great extent and extreme variety and exuberance of form and coloration. The head is narrow, the prothorax produced and narrowed and the exposed part of the metathorax relatively large and generally triangular; the wing-covers are large, obtusangular, rhyate, with a broad costal margin. Some of these insects secrete the substance called Chinese wax.

flatlet, n. [< L. flatilis, < flare, pp. flatus, blow = E. blow¹; see flatus.] Inconstant; varying with the wind. [Scot.]

E. plait, pleat*, and ply, q. v.] 1. (a) The common name for plants of the genus Linum and for the fiber obtained from the stems of L. usitatissimum. This species, of unknown origin, has been in cultivation from a very remote period, and yields the principal vegetable fiber in popular use over the larger part of the old world. The plant is an annual, with slender stems about two feet tall, which by various processes are freed from all useless matter, leaving the elongated bast-cells in the form of a soft, silky fiber. This fiber is used in the manufacture of linen thread and cloth, cambric, lawn, lace, etc. The principal sources of supply are Russia, Germany, the Netherlands, and Ireland. The flowers are blue. The seeds, known as linseed and flaxseed, are very nutritious, and are used on that account in medicine. They also yield an oil, which is extensively used by painters; and the residue, called linseed-cake, has much value as feed for cattle. The dwarf, fairy, mountain, or purging flax of England is L. catharticum; and the wild flax of the United States, L. virginicum and L. perenne.

Flax, Linum usitatissimum, with section of seed-vessel.

the Flemings.—2. The language spoken by the Flemings. The Flemish language is a form of that Low German of which the Dutch is the type. The chief external difference between Dutch and Flemish is in the spelling, the spelling of Dutch having been reformed and simplified in the present century, while Flemish retains in great part the archaic features of sixteenth-century spelling.

Dan. flint = Sw. flint (in comp.), G. flinte (whence Bohem. and Pol. flinta, Lett. plinte), a gun; see flint-lock.] I. n. 1. A form of silica, somewhat allied to chaledony, but more opaque, and with less luster. It is usually of a light-gray or brownish color. It has a peculiarly well-marked conchoidal fracture, and can easily be broken up into fragments having sharp cutting edges. For this reason, and because of its hardness, which is proverbial, flint was most extensively used in prehistoric times for all kinds of cutting implements. The use of flint as a means of striking fire with a steel, and especially as a part of the once almost universally used musket-lock, is well known. Flint occurs in large quantity in the form of nodules, and even sheets or beds, in the chalk of England and France, and has been formed by the slow replacement of carbonate of lime by silica held in solution in water. It is abundant in the United States, generally in massive forms. The exterior of most flints is of a lighter color than the interior, this difference being caused by a rearrangement of the particles of the silica.

Then he took up the Eldridge sword,
As hard as any flint.

Sir Cuthbert (Child's Ballads, III. 180).

The old chief . . . slowly shapes, with axe of stone,
The arrow-head from flint and bone.

Whittier, Mogg Megone, ii.

2. A piece of flinty stone used for any purpose, as for striking fire in a flint-lock musket or otherwise, or in the form of an implement. See under flint-lock.

II. a. 1. Made or composed of flint.—2. Hard and firm, as if made of flint; as, flint corn or flint wheat. Flint implements, matchlock, implements used by man before the use of metals, so called because, although occasionally found of granite, jade, serpentine, jasper, basalt, and other hard stones, these flint-studded, as well as the most numerous examples, are formed of flint. They consist of arrow-heads, ax-heads or chisels, lance-heads, knives, wedges, etc. Flint implements have been found in many regions of the globe; often, as in the Somme valley in France, in apparently upheaved beds of drift, and in connection with the remains of extinct species of the elephant, rhinoceros, and other mammals, whence man's existence on the globe at a geological period anterior to the present has been inferred. Flint implements are still used by some savage tribes.

flintamentosa (flin'ta-men-to'sä), n. A name given in Australia to the tree Flindersia Grayana.

flinted (flin'ted), a. [< flint + -ed.] Hardened; emel. Dumas.

Also see the byrthplace of flinted Misses.

Stanhurst, Anecd., iii. 279.

flint-glass (flin't-gläs), n. A variety of glass in which the silica is combined with oxid of lead in greater or less quantity. The larger the amount of lead the higher the specific gravity and the refractive power, and the greater the brilliancy of the product. Flint glass is often called crystal glass, or simply crystal, while some limit the name flint glass to the variety specially made for optical purposes. Besides the oxid of lead, potash is an essential ingredient of flint-glass or crystal. Analyses of different kinds of crystal show the presence of from 25 to 37 per cent. of oxid of lead, 14 to 17 of potash, and 52 to 59 of silica. The flint glass of common use for optical purposes and generally admitted to be of unrivalled excellence, contains about 43 per cent. of oxid of lead and 12 of potash. The brilliancy of crystal glass fits it for use for ornamental purposes, and especially for the most showy and expensive table ware. The characteristic luster and sparkle due to the high refractive power of the material is brought out by cutting and polishing, exactly as is done in the case of gems. Owing, however, to its softness, crystal glass is easily scratched by careless handling and dulled by wear. The name flint-glass originated in the fact that the silica first used in England for the manufacture of this article was derived from flints. An essential requisite for good flint-glass is purity of the materials employed, and the forms of the furnace and of the melting-pots are peculiar. Great technical skill is required for the production of the best kind of glass for optical purposes. See glass, strass, and lens.

flint-heart (flin'härt), a. Same as flint-hearted.

Under the conduct of Great Soliman,
Have I been chief commander of an host,
And put the flint heart Persians to the sword.

flirtation (flērt-tā'shon), n. [< flirt + -ation.]

1. A flirting; a quick sprightly motion. [Rare.]—2. Playing at courtship; amorous trifling or adventure.

I assisted at the birth of that most significant word flirtation, which dropped from the most beautiful mouth in the world, and which has since received the sanction of our most accurate Laurent in one of his comedies. Some inattentive and undiscerning people have, I know, taken it to be a term synonymous with coquetry; but I lay hold of this opportunity to undeceive them, and eventually to inform Mr. Johnson that flirtation is short of coquetry, and intimates only the first limits of approximation, which subsequent coquetry may reduce to those preliminary articles that commonly end in a definite treaty.

Chesterfield, quoted in Brit. Essayists, ci. 210.

A propensity to flirtation is not confined to age or country, and . . . its consequences were not less disastrous to the mail-clad Ritter of the dark ages than to the silken courtier of the seventeenth century.

Barham, Ingoldsby Legends, II. 33.

Or, if, perhaps, it was only a passing folly, a foolish little flirtation, nothing serious at all?

Mrs. Oliphant, Poor Gentleman, xxvii.

= Syn. 2. Flirtation, Coquetry. Coquetry may be general; as she was full of coquetry. Flirtation is special. Coquetry is the result of the love of admiration; flirtation is more often for the testing or the exhibition of power, and is generally venturesome or challenging.

flirtatious (flērt-tā'shus), a. [< flirtati-on + -ous.] Given to flirtation. [Colloq.]

Physalia has borne the name which designates its most striking peculiarity since the middle of the fifteenth century, on account, perhaps, of a somewhat fanciful likeness to a little sail. It is commonly called in Florida, where it is sometimes very abundant, the float.
Stand. Nat. Hist., I. 107.

(c) An air-sac or other light hollow or vesicular part or organ which floats or buoys some animals on the water, as the pneumatophore or pneumatocyst of a hydrosoma. The large inflated part of a physophora, as the Portuguese man-of-war, is a good example. See pneumatophore, and cut under Athorobia and Physalia.

13. Same as float, 4.

floatage, floatage (flō'tāj), n. [< F. flottage, floatage, raftage, < flotter, float; see float, v., and -age.] 1. The floating capacity or power of anything.

I should lighten the brig without imperilling the floatage power of the timber in the hold.

W. C. Russell, Sailor's Sweetheart, xiii.

2. Anything that floats on the water; flotsam. Hamersly.

floatant, a. See floatant.

floatation, n. See floatation.

float-board (flōt'board), n. 1. A board of the water-wheel of undershot mills which receives the impulse of the stream by which the wheel is driven.—2. One of the paddles of a steamer.

float-case (flōt'kas), n. A contrivance for elevating bodies by the upward pressure of water under an air-tight metallic case, moving in a well or shaft.

float-copper (flōt'kop'ēr), n. Copper in the form of fine particles carried away by running water. See float-mineral.

floater (flōt'ēr), n. 1. One who or that which floats or fluctuates; a person or thing in a floating condition, literally or figuratively.

Let not the suit of Venus thee displease—

Pity the floaters on th' Ionian seas.

Eusden, tr. of Ovid's Metamorph., iv.

2. One who floats game.—3. A registering float on a graduated stick, designed to indicate a level attained between periods of observation.—4. In political slang, a voter who is not definitely attached to any party; especially, a voter whose vote may be purchased. [U. S.]—5. A dead human body found floating in the water. [U. S.]

float-file (flōt'fil), n. See file 1.

float-gold (flōt'gold), n. Gold in the form of fine particles carried away by running water. See float-mineral.

float-grass (flōt'grās), n. One of several species of grass frequent in wet meadows, as Glyceria fluitans, Alopecurus geniculatus, and Catabrosa aquatica.

floating (flōt'ing), n. 1. The act of supporting one's self, or the state of being supported or borne, on the surface of water or other liquid; flotation.

When the sea was calm, all boats alike

Show'd mastership in floating. Shak., Cor., iv. 1.

2. In agri., the flooding or overflowing of meadow-lands.—3. The spreading of stucco or plaster on the surface of walls, etc.; also, the second coat of three-coat plastering-work.

The floating is of fine stuff with a little hair mixed with it.

Workshop Receipts, 1st ser., p. 122.

4. A method of obtaining pigments and other materials in a very finely divided state. They are first ground as fine as possible in a mill, and are then put into long sluiceways of slowly running water. The coarser particles sink first, while the finer are carried a longer distance. The latter are collected and dried, and constitute the floated material. Sometimes, by certain modifications, air is used instead of water.

The preparatory working, in order to remove mechanical impurities, is effected by levigation. The washed clay is dried, slightly calcined, and immediately ground to fine powder. The floating is done by hand or power.

Workshop Receipts, 2d ser., p. 406.

5. In electrotyping, the process of filling low-spaced forms of type with liquid plaster up to the shoulders of the type, and brushing off the superfluous plaster after it is dry, preparatory to taking a mold.—6. In weaving, a thread of weft which floats, spans, or crosses on the top of several warped threads. See flashing 3, 1.—7. The method or practice of hunting game by approaching it with a boat at night; fire-hunting; shining; jacking. The hunter, equipped with a lantern or torch, paddles noiselessly toward the game, as a deer in shallow water, until the reflection of the light from the animal's eyes affords an aim.

In jacking or floating, the shooter sits in the bow of a canoe just behind a lantern which throws a powerful light ahead, but is shaded from the hunter so as not to interfere with his powers of vision. The deer, raising their heads, stare at the light as it approaches, and when the boat is near enough, the hunter shoots.

Sportsman's Gazetteer, p. 83.

floating (flōt'ing), p. a. 1. Borne on the surface of the water or other liquid, or on the air; as, a floating leaf; floating islands.

Th' Atlantic billows roared

When such a destined wretch as I

His floating home forever left. •

Campbell, The Castaway.

The very air about the door

Made misty with the floating meal.

Tennyson, Miller's Daughter.

2. Not fixed or settled in a definite state or place; fluctuating; as, floating population.

He had at this period a floating intention of writing a history.

Rowell, Johnson, I, 203.

3. Free; disconnected; unattached; as, the floating ribs in some fishes.—4. In finance: (a) Composed of sums of varying amount due at different but specified dates; unfunded; as, a large floating debt. (b) Not fixed or definitely invested; not appropriated to any fixed permanent investment, as in lands, buildings, machinery, etc., but ready to be used as occasion demands; in circulation or use; as, floating capital (opposed to fixed capital). See capital 2.

Floating anchor, battery breakerwater, bridge, clough, dam, debt, derrick, dock, dome, elevator, gage, harbor, island, etc. See the nouns. Floating bricks. See bricks. Floating kidney, liver, meadow, rib, etc. See the nouns. Floating screed, in plastering, a strip of plaster arranged and nicely adjusted for guiding the float. See float, n., 3 (c). The floating vote, voters collectively who are not permanently attached to any political organization, and whose votes their fore cannot be counted upon by party managers. [U. S.]

floating-board (flōt'ing-board), n. A plate of cast-iron with a ribbed or corrugated under surface, but planed true on top, employed in floating up tin cans. (See to float up, under float, c. 1.) Also called floating-plate.

floating-heart (flōt'ing-hart), n. A name given to species of Limnanthum, from their floating cordate leaves.

floating-island (flōt'ing-island), n. In cooking, a dish made of cream or boiled custard, with white of egg beaten stiff and floating on the top, sometimes colored with jelly.

floating-lever (flōt'ing-lev'ēr), n. One of two horizontal brake-levers which are introduced under the center of a railroad-car body. Car-Builder's Dict.

floating-plate (flōt'ing-plat), n. 1. Same as floating-board.—2. In stereotyping (by the plaster process), a plate of iron, about half an inch thick, which fits loosely in the dipping-pan when the pan contains melted type-metal. This floating-plate, which floats in the heavier melted type-metal, aids in giving uniformity of the thickness to the stereotype-plate.

float-mineral (flōt'min'ēr-əl), n. Fragments of ore detached and carried to some distance from their native bed by currents of water or in the ordinary process of erosion; also, particles of metal which are liberated in the process of stamping, and are too thin and minute to settle readily in water; as in the case of float-gold or float-copper.

float-ore (flōt'ōr), n. Same as float-mineral.

floatsome, n. A dialectal variant of flotsam.

floatstone (flōt'stōn), n. 1. A spongy quartz, a mineral of a spongy texture, of a whitish-gray color, often with a tinge of yellow, so light as to float in water. It frequently contains a nucleus of common flint.—2. In bricklaying, a stone used to rub curved work smooth and remove the ax-marks, as in the heads and backs of niches. Its form is made the reverse of that of the surface on which it is to be used.

floaty (flōt'i), a. [Formerly also flotic; < float + -y.] 1. Able to float or swim on the surface; buoyant.

The hindrance to stay well is the extreme length of a ship, especially if she be floaty, and want sharpness of way forwards. Raleigh, 1585.

Some few bottles of beere being floaty they got, which though it had been six months under water was very good. Quoted in Capt. John Smith's Works, II, 154.

2. Rank and tall, as grass. [Prov. Eng.]

floci, n. Plural of floccus.

flocillation (flōk-si-lā'shōn), n. [< flocillus, an assumed dim. of L. floccus, a lock or flock of wool, etc.; see flock 2, n.] In pathol., a delirious picking of the bedclothes by a patient; carphologia.

flocipendri, v. t. [< L. flocci pendere, consider of no value, lit. value at a lock of wool; floci, gen. of floccus, a lock or flock of wool, etc. (used as a symbol of valuelessness); pendere, weigh, have value; see pendant. (Cf. ridipend.) To consider of no value; value not a hair.

By reason whereof he should be flocipendit and had in contempt & disloyalty of the Scottish people.

Hall, Hen. VII., an. 11.

flocose (flōk'ōs), a. [< L. floccosus, full of flocks of wool, < floccus, a flock of wool, etc.; see flock 2, n.] 1. Woolly; specifically, in bot., composed of or bearing flocci.—2. In ornith., same as flocculent, 3.

flocular (flōk'ū-lār), a. [< NL. flocculus + -ar.] Of the nature of or resembling a flocculus; specifically, in anat., of or pertaining to the flocculus of the cerebellum; as, the flocular fossa (that fossa in which the flocculus is lodged).

On its inner surface the flocular fossa is nearly always wide and deep, but it is absent, or nearly so, in the eurytaria, paca, and percipia.

W. H. Flower, Osteology, p. 158.

Flocular process, the flocculus.

floculate (flōk'ū-lat), a. [< NL. flocculus + -at.] In entom., bearing a flocculus or small bunch of curled hairs, as the trochanters of certain bees.

floculation (flōk'ū-lā'shōn), n. [< NL. flocculus + -ation.] The act or process of becoming floccular; specifically, in chem. and physics, the union of small particles into granular aggregates or compound particles of larger size, under the influence of a moderate agitation in water or other fluid.

If we begin with a strong solution of sulphuric, nitric, and chlorhydric acids mixed, and follow through repeated dilutions as above described, the flocculation and precipitation of the suspended material is almost equally rapid for several successive dilutions.

Amer. Jour. Sci., 3d ser., XXIX, 4.

flocule (flōk'ūl), n. [< NL. flocculus, dim. of L. floccus, a lock of wool; see flocculus.] Something resembling a small tuft of wool; specifically, in chem. and physics, a small compound particle formed from the union of still smaller particles by agitation in a liquid. See floculation.

flocculence (flōk'ū-lens), n. [< flocculent.] 1. The state of being woolly or flocculent; adhesion in small flocks or tufts; the condition of containing flocculi.

The reflecting surfaces which give rise to these aerial echoes are for the most part due to differences of temperature between sea and air. It, through any cause, the air above be chilled, we have descending streams. If the air below be warmed, we have ascending streams as the initial cause of atmospheric flocculences.

Pop. Sci. Mo., XIII, 287.

2. In entom., a soft, white, waxy substance exuded from various parts of the body, but primarily from the abdomen. It is found most commonly in the Homoptera.

flocculent (flōk'ū-lent), a. [< L. floccus, a lock of wool, etc. (see flock 2, + -ulent).] 1. Like a flock of wool; fleecy; woolly.

The weather had been fine and clear, and in the morning the air was full of patches of the flocculent web of the gossamer spider, as on an autumnal day in England.

Burton, Voyage of Beagle, I, 204.

Specifically—2. Coalescing and adhering in locks or flocks.

These red cells, acquiring thick cell walls, . . . float in flocculent aggregations on the surface of the water. This state seems to correspond with the "winter spores" of other Protophytes.

W. B. Carpenter, Micros., § 234.

3. In ornith., like or pertaining to the floccus. See floccus, 2 (b). Also floccosi.—4. In entom., covered, as an insect, or any part of it, with a soft, waxy substance, generally white in color and adhering in irregular flakes or strings, often of considerable length, as in many Homoptera. Flocculent precipitate, in chem., a woolly-looking precipitate, like that of alumina, from the solution of a salt to which ammonia is added.

floculi, n. Plural of flocculus.

floculose (flōk'ū-lōs), a. [< NL. as if flocculosus*, < flocculus, dim. of L. floccus, a lock of wool.] Woolly; like wool; flocculent; specifically, in bot., somewhat or finely floccose.

floculus (flōk'ū-lus), n. [pl. floculi (-h).] [NL., dim. of L. floccus, a flock of wool; see flock 2.]

1. A small flock of wool or something resembling it; a small tuft; a shred; a flake. Specifically—2. In anat., a tuft-like lobe of the cerebellar hemisphere on either side behind and below the middle peduncle of the cerebellum. The nodulus connects the two flocculi. Also called sub-peduncular lobe and pinus cerebelli lobulus.

3. In entom., a small bunch of fine curved hairs; particularly, a bunch of stiff hairs found on the posterior coxae of certain hymenopterous insects.—4. In chem. and physics, a small aggregation of particles formed by the agitation of a liquid containing them. Commissure of the flocculus. See commissure.

flocus (flōk'ūs), n. [pl. floci (-sī).] [L., a flock of wool, etc.; see flock 2.] 1. A flock or tuft of wool or something resembling it. Specifically—2. In zool.: (a) The long tuft of hair which terminates the tail in some quadrupeds. (b) In ornith., the peculiar covering of newly hatched or unfledged birds; the generally downy plumage, of simple structure, growing at first from the skin. It is afterward, for the most part, adixed to the tip of the growing new feathers, of which it is the precursor, or rather the first form of part, and finally falls off, not to be renewed. In pedipede birds the floccus is associated only with the true plumage, sprouting from the future pinna alone. In peripede birds it sprouts also from the apteria or featherless parts, and so far is not connected with the future plumage; in such cases the whole body is densely clothed.

3. In bot.: (a) A small tuft of woolly hairs. (b) pl. In mycology, hyphae or thread-like cells which compose the mycelium of a fungus, especially when they resemble fine wool.

When a long day's flogging has been at last followed by a solitary rise, it requires some nerve to be sufficiently hard on a fish.

Quarterly Rev., CXXVI, 350.

flogging-chisel (flog'ing-chiz'el), n. A large chisel used to chip off certain parts of an iron casting. One man holds the chisel while a second strikes it with a sledge-hammer.

flogging-hammer (flog'ing-ham'ér), n. A machinists' hammer in size between a sledge- and a hand-hammer.

flog-master (flog'más'tér), n. One who executes punitive flogging, as in a prison.

Bashy was never a greater terror to a blockhead, or the Bridewell flog-master to a night-walking strumpet.

Tom Brown, Works, II, 205.

flogster (flog'stér), n. [< flog + -ster.] One who is, as a schoolmaster, addicted to flogging. [Rare.]

Floirac (flwo-rak'), n. [F.] A red wine grown in the neighborhood of Bordeaux. It is one of the most abundant and commonly exported of the lower grades of claret above that of vin ordinaire.

float, n. [Also floyt; cf. flite and flout.] A eontost.

The Duke of Bedford, accompanied with the Erle of Marche and other Lordes, had a great float and batayll with dyvers carykkes of Jeanne and other shippes, were [where] after longe and sore fyght, ye honour yll to hym and his Englysshe men.

Edwain, Chron., I, an. 1516.

float (float), n. [Now only Sc., spelled floyt; ME. floyte, another form of floute, a flute; see flout and flute.] The form float, floyt, is perhaps due to the OD. form floute. 1. Same as flute. [Old Eng. and Scotch.]

And many a floute and litting hore,
And pypes made of grene corne.

Chaucer, House of Fame, I, 1223.

2. [Cf. OD. flayte, flattery, deception, flayten, talk smoothly or flatteringly, practise deception, tr. soothe with blandishments: see flout.] A flatterer or deceiver. Poebart; Jamieson.—

3. A petted person. Jamieson.—
float, v. i. [ME. floyten, another form of flouten, play the flute: see flout.] To play the flute.

flokhardt, n. Same as flocket.
flomet, n. Middle English forms of flume.
flonet, n. [ME. flone, flon, earlier flan, < AS. flān, early form fluan (pl. flānas, also flāna), also in shorter form flā, flaa (pl. flān), ME. fla, fo, an arrow, = Icel. fléinn, an arrow, dart, a bayonet-like pike, the fluke of an anchor. A similar loss of organic final n appears in mistletoe, < AS. mistlethūn = Icel. mistletrinn.] An arrow.

Hit monteth, and he let him gon,
So of howe doth the flon.

King Alisaunder, I, 784.

With flonz fleterede thay flitt fulle freschly tre frekez, fliehene with fetheris thurghle the fyne mayez.

Morte Arthure (E. E. T. S.), I, 2097.

flog, n. Obsolete preterit and past participle of fling.

flog (flog), n. In stereotyping, a combination of several sheets of moist tissue-paper successively superposed, with thin paste between; used by stereotypers, in the papier-mâché process, to form a mold or matrix from composed types. The flog is beaten on the types with a stiff brush, until it penetrates every depression. When dried it serves as a mold or matrix.—Drying the flog, the operation of exposing the matrix of flog to steam- or furnace heat until it is entirely free from moisture.

flood (flud), n. [In early mod. E. often floud, sometimes flut; < ME. floud, flod, rarely flud, < AS. flōd, flowing water, a river, the tide, a flood, the flood, = OS. flōd, flud = OFries. flōd, flod = D. vloed = MHG. vlōt, vlod, LG. flod = OHG. flōt, MHG. flud, G. flut, fluth = Icel. flōth = Sw. Dan. flod, flod, = Goth. flodus, a river; with formative -l (-th), from the root of AS. flōran, E. flow, etc.; see flow.] 1. Flowing water; a stream, especially a great stream; a river. [Now only poetical.]

The flood which men Nile calleth.

Gower, Conf. Amant, III, 103.

My lord Jesus schall come this day.

Fro Galylee vn to this flode 3e Jourdain call.

York Plays, p. 173.

What need the bridge much broader than the flood?

Shak., Much Ado, I, 1.

Arcadia's flow'ry plains and pleasing flods.

Deuden, tr. of Virgil.

2. A great body of water; the sea.

Jesu hem sente wynde ful good,

To ber hem over the salt flode.

Richard Coeur de Lion, I, 1393.

Timon hath made his everlasting mansion

Upon the beached verge of the salt flod.

Shak., T. of A., v, 2.

3. A great body of moving water, rising, swelling, and overflowing land not usually covered with water; a deluge; an inundation.

See schelle indrestonde, that it is on of the oldest Townes of the World. For it was founded before Noes Flode.

Manderley, Travels, p. 30.

He relents, . . .

And makes a covenant never to destroy

The earth again by flood. Milton, P. L., XI, 592.

The walls of Earth are with the great fresh flods washed to the ground.

Capt. John Smith, True Travels, I, 1.

4. The inflow of the tide; the semidiurnal rise or swell of water in the ocean; opposed to ebb.

The moon

The which hath with the see to done

Of flods high and ebbes lowe

Upon his change it shall be knowe

Gower, Conf. Amant, III, 103.

There is a tide in the affairs of men,

Which, taken at the flood, leads on to fortune.

Shak., J. C., iv, 3.

By Gods merite they recovered thim selves, & having ye flood with them, struck into ye harbor.

Bradford, Plymouth Plantation, p. 8.

5. A great body or stream of any fluid or fluid-like substance; anything resembling such a stream; as, a flood of lava; a flood of light.

See heaven its sparkling portals wide display,

And break upon thee in a flood of day.

Pope, Messiah, I, 95.

Freedom, in other lands scarce known to shine,

Pours out a flood of splendour upon thine.

Carver, Expostulation, I, 58.

Hence—6. A great quantity; an overflowing abundance; a superabundance.

For from the prince, as from a perpetual well spring, cometh among the people the flood of all that is good or evil.

Sir T. More, Utopia (tr. by Robinson), I.

You see this confluence, this great flood of visitors.

Shak., T. of A., i, 1.

7. The menstrual discharge when excessive.—Deucalion's flood, the destructive deluge from which, according to Greek mythology, Deucalion, son of Prometheus, and his wife Pyrrha alone survived to repopulate the earth. Half-flood, the time when the flood-tide has been running for three hours. Noah's flood, or the flood, the universal deluge recorded in Genesis as occurring in the days of Noah.

Go! if your ancient, but ignoble flood

Has crept through secondels ever since the flood.

Pope, Essay on Man, iv, 212.

Young flood, a term applied to the beginning of the flood-tide.

flood (flud), v. [< flood, n.] 1. trans. To overflow; inundate; deluge, literally or figuratively; as, to flood a building or a mine in order to extinguish a fire; to flood a meadow.

The moon is at her full and, rising high,

Floods the calm fields with light. Byngton, Tides.

The procession of fishermen sweeping from point to point within the reef, till the island, flooded with sunlight and torchlight, lies like a green sea-garden in a saddle of flame.

C. W. Stoddard, South-sea Idylls, p. 331.

The drawing room through the open windows was flooded with a sweet confusion of odors and bird-notes.

H. James, Jr., Pass. Pilgrum, p. 140.

II. intrans. 1. To be poured out abundantly; rise in a flood.

The Nile would have risen before his time.

And flooded at our nod. Tennyson, Fair Women.

This Lowman stream . . . is wont to flood into a mighty head of waters, when the storms of rain provoke it.

R. D. Blackmore, Forna Boone, I.

2. To have an excessive menstrual discharge; also, to bleed profusely after parturition; suffer post-partum hemorrhage; flow, as a lying-in woman.

floodage (flud'āj), n. [< flood + -age.] Inundation. Carlyle. [Rare.]

flood-anchor (flud'ang-ker), n. The anchor by which a ship rides during the flood-tide.

flood-cock (flud'kok), n. A cock for letting water into a magazine or shell-room on board a man-of-war, to flood it, in case of fire.

flooder (flud'ér), n. One who floods or irrigates.

flood-flanking (flud'flang-king), n. A method of embanking with stiff moist clay which is dug in spits and each spit thrown forcibly into its place so as to unite with the one previously thrown. As the clay dries it contracts, leaving crevices, which are filled by sludging. E. H. Knight.

flood-gate (flud'gāt), n. [ME. flodgate, flod-gate; < flood, I, + gate.] A gate designed to be opened to permit the outflow of water, or to be shut to prevent it; hence, any opening or opportunity for indiscriminate flow or passage; a great vent.

This canal had, without doubt, flood-gates to hinder too great a quantity of water from running into it on any rising of the river. Poore, Description of the East, II, 181.

They have opened the flood-gates to the immigration of foreign labor.

N. A. Rev., CXIII, 509.

[Used as an adjective by Shakespeare.

My particular grief
Is of so flood-gate and overbearing nature,
That it engulfs and swallows other sorrows.

Shak., Othello, I, i, 3.

flooding (flud'ing), n. 1. The act of overflowing or inundating; inundation.—2. The menstrual discharge when excessive; also, hemorrhage after childbirth.

floodling (flud'ing), p. a. In an obsolete use, lavish or profuse.

Surely we nickname this same floodling man, when we call him by the name of brave.

Falstaff, Resolves, I, 53.

floodless (flud'les), a. [< flood + -less.] Arid, Dumas.

A fruit less, flood less, yea a land less land.

Salisbury, tr. of Du Bassac's Works, III, The Lawe.

flood-mark (flud'märk), n. A mark or line showing the height to which the tide or a flood has risen or usually rises; high-water mark.

flood-tide (flud'tid), n. The rising tide. See flood, n., 4, and tide.

floodyt, a. [< flood + -y.] Pertaining to the sea or flood.

This monarch shall flody (supinator) the herring.

Asche, Lenten Stude (Harl. Mss., VI, 157).

flook, n. An obsolete form of fluke.

flook, n. See fluke.

flookan, n. See flucan.

flooking (fluk'ing), n. Same as flucan.

flooky, a. See fluky.

floor (flor), n. [Early mod. E. also floare, flor; dial. flour; < ME. flor, flora, flor, < AS. flor, flor, = D. flor = MHG. flor, LG. flor, a floor, = MHG. flur, m. and f., G. flur, m., floor, flooring, entrance-hall, flur, f., field, plain, level ground, = Icel. flor, the floor of a cow-stall, = Ir. and Gael. flar (for orig. plār*) = W. flawr = Bret. flur, floor.] 1. That part of a room or of an edifice which forms its lower inclosing surface, and upon which one walks; specifically, the structure, consisting in modern houses of boards, planks, pavement, asphalt, etc., which forms such a surface.

An ordinary floor of timber consists in its simplest form of boards laid down close together and supported upon a series of joists, as shown in fig. A. In floors over wide spaces, or in buildings of more costly construction, the floor-joists are themselves supported by additional beams or joists called linders, as shown in figs. B and C, the ceiling joists of the room below being fastened to the under side of the linders. It is usual in houses, etc., to brace and secure the floor-joists by means of crossed struts, as shown in fig. D, forming a strutted floor. In fire-proof buildings the wooden joists are replaced by iron beams, the spaces between which are bridged over by narrow vaults of brick, concrete, tiles, etc.

To rest he layd him downe upon the flor
(Why loue for ventious Knights the bedding best),
And thought his wearie limbs to have redrest.

Spenser, F. Q., IV, v, 39.

As he harp'd, and as he carpt,

Till all the lords good through the flor.

Lockhart's Water Child's Ballads, VI, 59.

And the flor of the house he solomon overlaid with gold, within and without.

I Ki., VI, 39.

2. Any similar construction, platform, or leveled area; as, the floor of a bridge; the charge-floor of a blast-furnace; a threshing-floor.

He will thoroughly purge his flor, and gather his wheat into the garner.

Mat., III, 12.

The level places where the bricks are moulded, called the flors.

flotation (flō-tā'shōn), n. [Formerly also written (accom.) floutation; < OF. as if flotation*, the orig. type of OF. flotaizon, F. dial. flotaizon, the flooding or irrigation of a meadow, F. flotaison, the line of flotation, water-line, < floter, float; see float. Cf. flotsam, ult. a doublet of flotation.] 1. The act or state of floating.

Nor is this individual life of the units provable only where free flotation in a liquid allows its signs to be readily seen.

H. Spencer, Prin. of Sociol., § 218.

The fruit consisted of racemes, or clusters of nutlets, which seem to have been provided with broad lateral wings for flotation in the air.

Huxley, Geol. Hist. of Plants, p. 133.

2. The science of floating bodies. Plane or line of flotation, the plane or line in which the horizontal surface of a fluid cuts a body floating in it; the dividing line between the part of a ship or other floating body below the surface of the water and that above it. In ships this line has an intimate relation to their buoyancy and equilibrium. Stable flotation, a phrase applied to that position of a floating body in which it is not ennable of being upset by the exertion of a small force, but, when slightly disturbed, invariably returns to its former position.

flotative (flō'tā-tiv), a. [< flotal(um) + -ive.] Of or pertaining to flotation; having the quality of floating. E. H. Knight.

flote¹, v. and n. A Middle-English form of float.

8. That part of an inclosed space, as a reservoir, along and from which a contained liquid is flowing. Flow-and-plunge structure, in geol., a peculiar form of stratification indicating its position in the presence of strong and frequently shifting currents. The flow-and-plunge structure is usually the same as valley bedding (which see, under valley). Flow of induction, across an element of surface, in magnetism, the product of the surface of the element by the perpendicular component of induction. Atmosc. Line of flow, in hydrodynamics, a curve imagined to be drawn within a liquid at any instant that at each point of the curve the velocity of the liquid is along the curve. A line of flow is not generally the path of a particle, because it represents only an instantaneous state of things, and as the particle moves upward the line of flow itself becomes distorted. But in the case of steady motion the lines of flow are fixed and are paths of particles, being then designated as streamlines.

Every line of flow cuts every equipotential curve which it meets at right angles; for at each point the resultant velocity is along the tangent to the line of flow and along the normal to the equipotential curve.

Münchke, Triplanar Kinematics, VI, § 101.

flow² (flou), n. [See, < Icel. flot, a marshy moor, also a bay or large frith, < flot, flood; see *flow*¹.] A marshy moor; a morass; a low-lying piece of watery land.

In many of these morasses, or flows, as they are called, when the surface is bored, the water issues out like a torrent.

Statist. Acc. of Scotland, XIX, 20.

Hence also (from L. flōs (flor-), a flower) E. flora, floral, etc., and (from L. flōere, flourish) flower, v., flourish, florid, etc.] 1. In bot.: (a) A growth comprising the reproductive organs of a phenogamous plant and their envelops. A complete flower consists of pistil, stamens, corolla, and calyx in regular series, any one or more of which may be absent. The female organs, or those of fructification, are the ovules, which are usually inclosed within a staminal bearing pistil or ovary. The male or fertilizing organs are the stamens, the essential part of which is the pollen case or anther. According to the association or separation of these organs in the flower or upon the plant, flowers are bisexual (thermaphrodite or perfect), unisexual, monocious, dioecious, etc. The corolla and calyx form the floral envelop or perianth, which may be wholly wanting, in which case the flower is said to be naked or achlamydeous; if the corolla only is absent, the flower is monochlamydeous. (b) In biology, the growth comprising the reproductive organs in mosses.—2. In popular language: (a) Any blossom or inflorescence.

No fluctuant crowd to hail divinity.
 R. F. Cooke, Wood Worship.

fluctuate (fluk'tū-āt), v.; pret. and pp. fluctuated, ppr. fluctuating. [< L. fluctuatus, pp. of fluctuare (> It. flutuare = Sp. Pg. fluctuar = OF. floter, flotter, F. flotter), waver, rise in waves, move to and fro, float, fluctuate, < fluctus, a flowing, a flow, a wave, billow, < fluere, pp. fluens, orig. "fluctus, flow; see fluct.] Cf. flout, v.] 1. Intrans. 1. To have a wave-like motion; rise and fall in level or degree; undulate; waver.

So sounds, so fluctuates the troubled sea,
As the expiring tempest plows its way.
 King, Rindins, or the Favourite.

Fair France! though now the traveller sees Thy three-striped banner fluctuate on the breeze, Wordsworth, Descriptive Sketches.

2. To move or pass backward and forward as if on waves; be wavering or unsteady; rise and fall; change about; as, public opinion often fluctuates; the funds or the prices of stocks fluctuate.

The mind may for some time fluctuate between [two feelings], but it can never entertain both at once.
 Goldsmit, The Bee, No. 3.

The population is therefore constantly fluctuating.
 D. Webster, Speech, Plymouth, Dec. 22, 1820.

The standard of antiquity fluctuates.
 E. A. Freeman, Amer. Lects., p. 171.

=Syn. Fluctuate, Vacillate, Waver, Oscillate, Undulate, apply to literal or figurative movements to and fro, or up and down; but undulate is used only physically, as of the sea, sound-waves, etc. Fluctuate, vacillate, and undulate in their figurative uses are founded upon the rise and fall of waves; oscillate refers to the swinging of a pendulum. Vacillate, and next to it waver, suggests the most of mental or moral indecision. Oscillate naturally suggests the most regular alternations of movement to and fro. Vacillate and waver are now rarely used of physical things; waver is also used of a hesitation that seems likely to end in yielding.

He had by no means undoubting confidence in the fluctuating resolutions of Leicester, whose mind seemed to him agitated beyond the government of calm reason.
 Scott, Kenilworth, xxvii.

In the first place, though a perpetually changing, he [Sir Robert Peel] was never a vacillating statesman.
 W. R. Greg, Misc. Essays, 2d ser., p. 234.

Then almost mak it waver in my faith.
 Shak., M. of V., iv. 1.

As when a sunbeam waves warm
Within the dark and duple beck
 Tennyson, Miller's Daughter.

God offers to every mind its choice between truth and repose. . . . Between these, as a pendulum, man oscillates.
 Emerson, Essays, 1st ser., p. 310.

The bold rocks thrust their black and naked heads above the undulating outline of the mountain ranges.
 Cowper, East of Malacca, xiv.

II. trans. 1. To put into a state of fluctuating or wave-like motion. [Rare.]

A breeze began to tremble over
The large leaves of the sycamore
And fluctuate all the still perfume.
 Emerson, In Memoriam, xcv.

2. To cause to waver or be undecided. [Rare.]

The younger sisters are bred rebels too, but the thought of guiding their mother, when such royal distinction was intended her, flattered and fluctuated them.
 Wace, D'Arblay, Diary, IV. 204.

fluctuating (fluk'tū-ā-ting), p. a. Wavering; moving as a wave; rising and falling; moving to and fro; changeable.

All those who had speculated on the rise and fall of this fluctuating currency [wampum] found their edging at an end.
 Trimmer, Knickerbocker, p. 276.

The sober people of America are weary of the fluctuating policy which has directed the public councils.
 D. Webster, Speech, March 10, 1818.

The highest poetry deals with thoughts and emotions which inhabit, like rarest sea-mosses, the doubtful limits of that shore between our abiding divine and our fluctuating human nature.

Lowell, Among my Books, 2d ser., p. 251.

Fluctuating function, a function which constantly changes its value by a finite quantity for an infinitely small change in the variable, alternately increasing and decreasing without ever being infinite. The name was given by Sir W. R. Hamilton.

fluctuation (fluk'tū-ā'shon), n. [= OF. fluctuatio, fluctuacio, F. fluctuation = Sp. fluctuacion = Pg. fluctuação = It. fluttuazione, < L. fluctuatio(n)-, < fluere, fluctuate; see fluctuate.] Cf. flotation, flotsam.] 1. A motion like that of waves; a waving; movement in different directions; as, the fluctuations of the sea.

Each base.

To left and right, of those tall columns drown'd
In silken fluctuation and the swarm Of female whisperers.
 Tennyson, Princess, vi.

2. Alternating action or movement; a wavering or varying course; mutation; as, the fluctuations of prices or of the funds; fluctuations of opinion.

The eccentricities, it is true, will still vary, but too slowly, and to so small an extent as to produce no inconvenience from fluctuation of temperature and season.
 Paley, Nat. Theol., xxii.

Latin was in the sixteenth century a fixed language, while the living languages were in a state of fluctuation.
 Macaulay, Lord Bacon.

3. In med., the alternating motion of pus or other fluids perceptible on palpation.

The experimenter injected three fourths of a centimetre of the mixture [culture of curved bacilli] under the skin of his left forearm, with the result of much oedematous swelling and some pain, with deep fluctuation in the region of the puncture, three days afterwards. Science, V. 432.

=Syn. 1 and 2. Oscillation, vacillation.

fluctuous (fluk'tū-us), a. [= F. fluctueux = Sp. Pg. flutuoso = It. flutuoso, < L. flutuosus (very rare), full of waves, billowy, < fluctus, a flowing, a wave; see fluctuate, fluent.] Pertaining to waves; flowing.

Madona Amphitrite's fluctuous demans.

Nashe, Leiten stude (Harl. Misc., VI. 151).

flue¹ (flō), n. [= Sc. flue. Origin obscure; perhaps connected with MD. D. clough, grooves, channels, the flutes of a fluted column. There is no evidence to connect the word with OF. fluc, fluic, a flowing, a stream (< L. fluviu, a stream). Skat considers flue to be "a mere corruption of flute," citing in support of this view the use in Phæar's Virgil (see extract under def. 2; but such a corruption of an established word like flute at the period concerned is scarcely possible; Phæar's flue, if not a misprint for flute, is prob., like flue in organ-building (def. 3), merely a deflected use of flue in the ordinary sense, with some ref. to the accidentally similar flute.] 1. A duct for the conveyance of air, smoke, heat, or gases. Specifically—(a) Formerly, a small winding chimney of a furnace carried up into the main chimney. (b) Now, the central passage for smoke in a chimney, or a side passage leading from a fireplace to this main passage.

9th. To the old and ragged city of Leicester, large and pleasantly situated, but despicably built, y^e chimney flues like so many smith's forges.

Edw. 4. Memoirs, Aug. 9, 1654.

He wrote on a pane of glass how I'd climb, if the way I only knew.

And she writ beneath, if your heart's afeared, don't venture up the flue.

Hood, The Sweep's Complaint.

(c) A pipe or tube for conveying heat to water in certain kinds of steam-boilers. (c) A passage in a wall for the purpose of conducting heated air from one part of a building to another.

2. [See etym.] The winding hollow of a sea-shell. [Rare.]

Him Tryton, combous bare, that galeon blew with whelkid shell.

Whose wrinkled wreathed flue (Latin concha) did fearful shrill in seas outell.

Phaer, Ecclid, x.

3. In organ-building, a flute-pipe as distinguished from a mouth-pipe or reed-pipe.—4. The coping of a gable or end-wall of a house, etc. Hallivell. [Prov. Eng.]—Dead flue, a flue which is no longer used.—Flash-flue, a form of flue, without turns or obstructions, for a steam-boiler.

flue² (flō), v. i.; pret. and pp. flued, ppr. fluing. [Appar. < *flue*¹, n., the entrance of a flue being usually expanded or splayed.] To expand or splay, as the jambs of a window.

flue³ (flō), n. [Also written flor (flor²). Origin uncertain; the nearest form outside of E. is Lit. flōg, anything light that floats in the air, flocks of wool, etc. (as if < Lat. flōgen = E. *fly*¹); but this mingles with flok, in the same sense, = E. *flock*²; so E. dial. flouk, fluke, equiv. to *flue*³. The form fluff, also spelled flough (?), points to an orig. guttural (W. fluch, dust, powder ?). Cf. Dan. flugg = Sw. flugg, down, motes, flue, Dan. fluk, pappus. The incomplete evidence points to two or more different sources for these words.] Down or nap; waste downy matter, abounding in spinneries, lint-factories, etc.; downy refuse; fine hair, feathers, flocks of cotton, etc., that cling to clothes. flue⁴, flue⁵ (flō), a. [< ME. flōw, shallow; origin obscure.] Shallow. Hallivell; Hulot. [Prov. Eng.]

Flōw, or scholde (shoal), as vessel or other lyke, bassus. Prompt. Parer, p. 167.

flue⁶ (flō), n. [Corrupted from fluke.] In whaling, the fluke or barb of a harpoon.

flue⁷ (flō), n. [Morocco.] A money of account of Morocco, of the value of one twenty-fifth of an English penny, or one thirtieth of a cent.

flue⁸ (flō), n. [Appar. an arbitrary reduction of influenza.] Influenza. [Rare.]

I have had a pretty fair share of the flue, and believe I am now well rid of it at last.

Southey, Letters, IV, 574, 1839.

flue-boiler (flō'boi'ler), n. A steam-boiler with flues or heat-pipes running through the part that contains the water.

flue-bridge (flō'brīj), n. In metal., the low wall of fire-brick, at the end opposite the fire-bridge, separating the hearth of the furnace from the flue.

flue-brush (flō'brush), n. A brush made of strips of wire or steel used to cleanse the interior of a flue from scales and soot.

flue-cinder (flō'sin'ēr), n. Metal cinder or slag obtained in the reheating or balling furnace in the process of working puddled bar into merchant-iron.

flued (flōd), a. [< *flue*² + -ed.] In whaling, fluked; barbed; having a fluke or flue, as a harpoon; usually in composition, as, one-flued; two-flued.

flueful (flō'fūl), a. [Appar. < *flue*¹ + -ful; as if 'full to the flue or chimney.'] Brimful. [Prov. Eng.]

flue-hammer (flō'ham'ēr), n. [< *flue*² + hammer.] A cooper's hammer the peen of which has a working edge whose length is in the plane of the sweep of the hammer. It is used to spread or flatten one edge of an iron hoop to make it fit the bulge of a cask.

fluellent, n. [Also written fluellen; said to be of W. origin, < Fluelen (as in Shakespeare), a form of Flendrin, a proper name. Cf. D. fluvel, velvet, fluvelblom, amaranth (lit. 'velvet flower'; see velvet flower and fluoranth).] An old name for the plant Leucanthea alchemilla. Female fluellen, v. l. Fluella, v. l.

fluellite (flō'li) n., m. [Ireg. < fluor + Gr. lithos.] Native fluoride of aluminium occurring at Stenna gwyn, in Cornwall, in octahedral crystals.

fluency (flō'en'si), n. [F. fluence = Pg. fluencia, < L. fluētia, a flowing, fluency, < fluere (t), ppr. of fluere, flow; see fluant.] 1. A flowing; a stream. Devo

That he first did cleanse
With sulphur, then with fluencies of sweetest water rease.
Chapman, Iliad, xvi, 224.

2. Fluency.

He is conceited to have a voluble and smart fluency of tongue.
Milton, On Def. of Humb. Remonst., Pref.

fluency (flō'en'si), n. [See fluence.] 1. The quality of being fluent. (a) The quality of being flowing or changeable; opposed to rigidity.

An arbitrary rule, an institution, must be opposed to the fluency, the ever-changing relations, of nature and fact.
Mind, IX, 396.

(b) Readiness and smoothness of utterance; volubility.

Unpremeditated prayers, uttered with great fluency, with a devout warmth and earnestness, are apt to make strong and awakening impressions on the minds of the generality of hearers.
Ep. Atterbury, Sermons, II, xv.

A man of weak capacity, with fluency of speech, triumphs in outwitting you.
Steele, Tatler, No. 244.

2†. Affluence; abundance.

Those who grow old in fluency and ease.
Sandys, Paraphrase of Job.

=Syn. Glibness, facility, readiness.

fluent (flō'ent), a. and n. [< L. fluē(t)s, ppr. of fluere, pp. flurus, flow, = Gr. phreō, swell, overflow, ava-phreō, spout up. Not related to E. *flow*¹. Hence ult. (< L. fluere) E. fluid, flur, fluclate, etc., flotsam, flome, affluent, effluent, influx, refluent, etc.] 1. a. 1. Flowing or capable of flowing; having a flowing motion, or an appearance as of flowing; changeable; not rigid.

Motion being a fluent thing, . . . it doth not follow that because anything moves this moment it must do so the next.
Ray, Works of Creation.

Broad brows and fair, a fluent hair and fine,
High nose, a nostril large and fine, and hands
Large, fair, and fine.
Tennyson, Gareth and Lynette.

I never had dreamed of such delicate motion, fluent and graceful.
R. D. Blackmore, Lorna Doone, x.

Morality is not a matter of goodness, but of true relation to facts—a relation which must be fluent, which cannot be rigid.
Mind, IX, 395.

2. Ready in the use of words; using words with facility; voluble; as, a fluent speaker or writer.

Not but the tragic spirit was our own,
And full in Shakespear, fair in Otway shone:
But Otway failed to polish or refine,
And fluent Shakespear source effaced a line.
Pope, Imit. of Horace, II, i, 279.

Once on the theme of her own merits, Mademoiselle was fluent.
Charlotte Brontë, Shirley, vi.

3. Proceeding from a faculty of ready copious speech; marked by copiousness of speech: as, fluent utterance; a fluent style.

How fluent nonsense trickles from his tongue!
How sweet the periods, neither said nor sung!
Pope, Dunciad, iii, 201.

II. n. 1†. A stream; a current of water.

Contending in their hands, that sedulous strive
To rent the outrageous fluent.
J. Phillips, Blenheim.

2. In the doctrine of fluxions, the variable or flowing quantity in fluxions which is continually increasing or decreasing; an integral. See fluxion.—Contemporary fluents, functions of the same independent variable. Correction of a fluent. See correction.—Fluent by continuation, an expression for the fluent of a fluxion deduced from the expression for the fluent of another fluxion. Fluent by series, the expression of the fluent of a fluxion in the form of an infinite series. Fluent of a fluxion, the integral of a function as conceived in the doctrine of fluxions.

fluential (flō'en'shal), a. Pertaining to or of the nature of a fluent.

fluently (flō'ent-li), adv. In a fluent manner.

For when this humour of mediocrity springs in the head of the company, it ruins fluently in to the less noble parts.
W. Montague, Devoute Essays, II, § 2.

fluency (flō'ent-nes), n. The state of being fluent; fluency.

The fluency and consistency of time has not this inconvenience, to deny us the taking a dimension of it.
W. Montague, Devoute Essays, II, vii, § 3.

flue-plate (flō'plat), n. In steam-boilers, a plate in which the ends of flues or tubes are set. Also called tube-plate and tube-sheet.

flue-stop (flō'stōp), n. In organ-building, a stop whose tone is produced by the impel of a stream of air upon a sharp edge; a generic name for all stops not reed-stops. Also flute-stop.

flue-surface (flō'sēr'fīs), n. The part of the surface of a steam-boiler heated by flues, as distinguished from that part which is heated directly by the furnace.

flue-work (flō'wōrk), n. In organ-building, all the flue-stops taken together, in distinction from the reed-stops or reed-work. Also flute-work.

fluey (flō'i), a. [< *flue*³ + -y.] Resembling or containing flue, or loose fur or soft down; downy; fluffy.

I had the luggage out within a day or two. . . . It was all very dusty and fluey.
Dickens, Somebody's Luggage, i.

fluff¹ (fluf), n. [Also written flough (?); connection with *flue*³ uncertain: see *flue*³, and cf. *fluff*².] 1. Light down or nap such as rises from cotton, beds, etc., when agitated; flue.

In Italy there are old crones so haggard that it is hard not to believe them created just as crooked and foul and full of fluff and years as you behold them.

Howells, Venetian Life, vii.

2. Something downy or fluffy.

Tiny fluffs of feathered life (snow-birds).

Lowell, Study Windows, p. 51.

He (Edison) proposed to introduce into the circuit a cell containing carbon powder, the pressure on which could be varied by the vibrations of a diaphragm. He sometimes held the carbon powder against the diaphragm in a small shallow cell, . . . and sometimes he used what he describes as a fluff—that is, a little brush of silk fibre with plumbeo rubbed into it.
Encyc. Brit., XXIII, 129.

fluff¹ (fluf), v. t. [< *fluff*¹, n.] To treat with fluff or powder.

The flesh side (of leather blackened and dressed on the grain side) is whitened or fluffed, and the grain is treated with sweet oil or some similar oil, and finally glazed with a thin solution of gelatin or of shellac.

Encyc. Brit., XIV, 387.

fluff² (fluf), n. [Perhaps imitative, like puff, q. v.] 1. A puff. [Scotch.]

I'm sure an ye werna a fish or something war, ye could never a' kept a fluff o' breath in the body o' ye in aneath the lock.
Saint Patrick, III, 31. (Jamieson.)

2. A slight explosion of gunpowder.—A fluff in the pant, an explosion of priming in the lock-pan of a flint-lock gun, while the gun itself does not go off; figuratively, any ineffectual, short, spasmodic effort which dies in the attempt; a flash in the pan.

fluff² (fluf), v. t. [See the noun.] To cause to puff.—To fluff powder, to burn gunpowder.

fluff-gib (fluf'jib), n. A squib. [Scotch.]

Name of this unlawful 'wark, wif fighting, and flashes, and fluff-gibs, disturbing the king's peace, and disarming his soldiers.
Scott, Rob Roy, xxi.

fluffiness (fluf'i-nes), n. The state or quality of being fluffy; flocculence.

This fluffiness and lavity of the plumage.

Cones, Key to N. A. Birds.

fluffy (fluf'i), a. [< *fluff*¹ + -y.] Composed of, containing, or resembling fluff or loose flocculent matter, as nap or down; giving off loose floating particles when agitated; fluey.

The carpets were fluffy.
Thackeray.

It was the solid compressed weight of gold compared with the fluffy bulk of feathers.

Cornhill Mag.

flügelhorn (flō'gl'hörn), n. [G., < flügel, a wing (see fugleman), + horn = E. horn.] 1. A hunting-horn.—2. A kind of bugle.

flugelman (flō'gl'mau), n. Same as fugleman.

fluibler (flō'i-bl), a. [< L. fluere, flow, + -ible.] Capable of flowing; fluid.

As the waters also were earthie, and the earth fluible.
Purchas, Pilgrimage, p. 8.

fluid (flō'id), a. and n. [= F. fluide = Sp. fluido = Pg. It. fluido, < L. fluidus, flowing, fluid, < fluere, flow; see fluant.] 1. a. 1. Capable of flowing; liquid or gaseous; consisting of a substance incapable of resisting forces (tangential stresses) tending to change its shape.

That powerful Juice, with which no cold dares mix,
Which still is fluid.
Congreve, Imit. of Horace, I, ix, 2.

Transparent forms, too fine for mortal sight,
Their fluid bodies half dissolved in light.
Pope, R. of the L., ii, 62.

2. Not fixed or rigid; flowing; shifting; fluent.

Thought, feeling, sentiment, language, metre; all the elements of their art are fluid, copious, untrammelled, poured forth from a richly abundant vein.

Fortnightly Rev., N. S., XI, 335.

Fluid compass, a compass the card of which revolves in a bowl of alcohol on which it floats. See compass, 7.—Fluid dram, fluid ounce. See the nouns. Fluid extracts. See extract, 2. Fluid inclusion, a liquid included in a cavity, usually very minute, in a mineral; thus, smoky quartz often contains fluid inclusions of liquid carbon dioxide. Fluid lens, a lens made by confining a liquid between two curved pieces of glass.

II. n. 1. A substance which flows or is capable of flowing; a substance which is incapable of resisting forces (tangential stresses) tending to change its shape without altering its size. A fluid has absolutely no tendency to spring back to its original shape when distorted, except in virtue of a surface tension. A perfect fluid is a fluid in which a bending stress produces an instantaneous strain—that is to say, there is no delay in taking a form of equilibrium, except what is due to the masses of the particles; opposed to a viscous fluid, in which the yielding is not instantaneous, and to a plastic solid, which yields instantaneously to a sufficient, but not to a very small, stress. Fluids are divided into liquids and gases or vapors. Gases or elastic fluids tend to expand indefinitely while preserving their homogeneity; liquids or inelastic fluids tend to expand indefinitely, but only by evaporation—that is, by separating into two parts with a bounding surface between them. (See liquid, gas, and ether.) In the early history of physical science the phenomena of heat, electricity, and magnetism were supposed to be due to the motions of peculiar imponderable fluids; hence the expressions north and south magnetic fluid, the electrical fluid, etc., which still linger (but not with good writers), though the explanation of the phenomena has changed with the advance of knowledge.

A fluid is a body the contiguous parts of which act on one another with a pressure which is perpendicular to the surface which separates those parts.

Clark Maxwell, Heat, p. 95.

2. Some hypothetical supersensible substance conceived as analogous to known fluids. See fluidism.—Amniotic, astral, cerebrospinal, elastic, etc., fluid. See the adjectives. Gondy's fluid, a solution of potassium permanganate, used as a disinfectant and deodorizer.—Culture fluid. See culture fluid. Discharge of fluids. See discharge. Fluid of Cotunnus, the perilymph. Also called liquor Cotunnii. Labarraque's fluid, a solution of chlorinated soda, used as a disinfectant; the liquor soda-chlorate of the United States Pharmacopoeia. Commonly called Labarraque's solution.—Magnetic, nervous, etc., fluid. See the adjectives. Müller's fluid, potassium bichromate 2 parts, potassium sulphate 1 part, water 100 parts, used to harden and preserve anatomical specimens with a view to cutting sections.

fluidal (flō'id-dal), a. [< fluid + -al]. Of, pertaining to, or of the nature of a fluid.—Fluidal structure, in lithol., an arrangement of the minute crystalline bodies (crystallites) in a more or less vitreous rock with their longer axes forming approximately parallel lines, as if turned in one direction by a current slowly sweeping upward an unconsolidated or viscous mass. Fluidal structure is best seen in the glassy and acidic eruptive rocks, and in furnace-slugs. Also called fluxion structure.

The lamination of the ore and jasper is taken to be probably a fluidal structure.

Amer. Jour. Sci., 3d ser., XXXI, 256.

fluidic (flō'id'ik), a. [< fluid + -ic]. Of, pertaining to, or of the nature of a fluid; fluid.

Undoubtedly the more prolonged and older fluidic condition, accompanied by accelerated lagging of tide, impresses more important results on the life-history of satellites.

Witchell, World-Life, p. 242.

Fluidic body, in spiritualism, the so-called fluid double of the physical body; a materialization; a form derived from the phrase corps fluidique of the French spiritualists. See fluidism.

fluidification (flō'id i-fī-kā'shōn), n. [< fluidify + -ation]. The act of rendering fluid.

In nineteen of the beef-infusion gelatine tubes no fluidification had taken place.

Amer. Nat., XXII, 126.

fluidify (flō'id'ī-fī), v. t.; pret. and pp. fluidified, ppr. fluidifying. [< L. fluidus, fluid; + -ficare, make; see fluid and -fy]. To render fluid; to convert into a liquid or gaseous state.

That the fluidified granite was once encased, its mineralogical composition and structure, and the bold conical shape of the mountain-masses, yield sufficient evidence.

Darwin, Geol. Observations, ii, 500.

fluidism (flō'id-dizm), n. [< fluid + -ism]. The hypothesis that there exists a supersensible or so-called fluidic body associated with every living body, and not confined entirely to the space occupied by the latter. Fluidism supposes that the ordinary physical body is like a core or nucleus of a more extensive body, which reaches in all directions beyond the visible surface of the natural body, and is capable of producing certain effects.

fluidist (flō'id'ī-dist), n. [< fluid + -ist]. One who supports the hypothesis of fluidism.

Even professions and vocations, as well as some diseases, seem to have often characteristic smells; so that disease, etc., "does not cease at the surface of the body." All such facts favor the fluidists.

Amer. Jour. of Psychol., II, 500.

fluidity (flō'id'ī-tī), n. [= F. fluidité = It. fluidità; < L. fluidus, fluid; see fluid]. 1. The quality of being fluid, or capable of flowing; that quality of a body which renders it incapable of resisting tangential stresses. See fluid, n.

There may be corpuscles of such a nature as considerably to lessen that agitation of the minute parts by which the fluidity of liquids and the warmth of other bodies are maintained.

Boyle, Works, III, 759.

2. Fluency; flowing character or style; opposed to rigidity or stiffness. [Rare.]

The letters [of Mme. de Remusat] . . . have much grace, much fluidity of thought, and of expression.

The Nation, Nov. 29, 1883.

fluidize (flō'id-diz), v. t.; pret. and pp. fluidized, ppr. fluidizing. [< fluid + -ize]. To convert into a fluid; fluidify.

fluidness (flō'id-nēs), n. The state of being fluid; fluidity. Boyle.

fluidounce (flō'id-ōuns), n. A fluid ounce. See ounce. [A method of writing the words common in medical use.]

fluidrachm (flō'id-dram), n. A fluid dram. See dram. [A method of writing the words common in medical use.]

fluitant (flō'id-tant), a. [< L. fluitant(-is), ppr. of fluitare, float, swim, or sail about, freq. of flui, flow; see fluent]. In bat., floating.

flukan, n. See flucin.

flake¹ (flōk), n. [Formerly also written flook; origin of source; perhaps a denasalized form of G. (Lut.) flunk, flunk, the fluke of an anchor, and lit. a wing (Lut. flunk, a wing), this being prob. a nasalized derivative of Lut. flugen, G. flugen = *E. fly*¹; cf. Lut. and G. flag, flight; see *fly*¹ and *flight*¹.] 1. The part of an anchor which catches in the ground. See anchor!

The waste and lumber of the shore,
Hard coils of cordage, swarthy fishing-nets,
Anchors of rusty fluke, and boats updrawn.

Tennyson, Enoch Arden.

2. One of the barbs of a harpoon or toggle-iron; a fluke; called by English whalers with-er.—3. Either half of the tail of a cetacean or sirenian; so called from its resemblance to the fluke of an anchor. The flukes of a large whale may be sometimes 20 feet between their extremities, though 12 to 15 feet is a more frequent measurement.

4. In mining, an instrument used to clean a hole previous to charging it with powder for blasting.—5. [< fluke¹, v.] In billiards, an accidentally successful stroke; the advantage gained when, playing for one thing, one gets another; hence, any unexpected or accidental advantage or turn; a chance; a scratch.

We seem to have discovered, as it were by a fluke, a most excellent rule for all future cabinet arrangements.

Times (London).

These conditions are not often fulfilled, I can tell you; it is a happy fluke when they are.

W. Black, Princess of Thule, xiv.

"Piquet gave 'discard' to the language; why should billiards be forbidden to contribute fluke, a far better word as regards form, and one absolutely without a synonym?"

X. and Q., 7th ser., I, 42.

The discovery which finally drove English geology out of a position which had long been untenable was made by a fluke.

X. and Q., 7th ser., I, 42.

To cut flukes out, in whaling: (a) To throw the tail out of the water sideways and upward, as a whale; an indication that the animal has taken fright and seeks to escape. Hence—(b) To become refractory or mutinous; to make a disturbance on board ship. To turn flukes, in whaling: (a) To round out and go under, throwing the flukes high in the air, as a whale. Hence—(b) To go to bed; bunk or turn in.

flake² (flōk), v.; pret. and pp. flaked, ppr. flaking. [< flake¹, n.] I. trans. In whaling: (a) To disable the flukes of, as a whale, by spading. (b) To fasten, as a whale, by means of a chain or rope.

II. intrans. 1. In whaling, to use the flukes, as a fish or cetacean; often with an indefinite it.—2. To gain an advantage over a competitor or opponent by accident or chance; especially, to make a scratch in billiards. See flake¹, n. 5. [Slang.] All flaking (cont.), a phrase used to indicate that a ship goes along rapidly with a fair wind.

We arrived on the following day, having gone all flaking, with the weather clew of the mainsail hauled up, the yards braced in a little, and the lower studding sail just drawing.

R. H. Hunt, Jr., Before the Mast, p. 285.

flake³, flook² (flōk), n. [Also dial. flook, flake, Se. flook, fluk; < ME. flake, also written flake, flake (glossed 'flaca' and 'pluinus'); < AS. flae, floue, a flat fish, usually glossed platessa (prop. platessa, a plaice, once passer, prop. passer (?), a turbot), = leel, flōki, a kind of halibut, passer, sole.] 1. A name given locally in Great Britain to species of flatfish. (a) In Northumberland, the common flounder, Pleuronectes flous, called in Moray Frith fresh water fluk and black fluk. (b) About Edinburgh, the dab, Limanda limanda, called salt water fluk, and in Moray Frith gray fluk. See cut under dab. (c) Along the east coast of Scotland, the turbot, Psetta maxima, also known as the roddan or roan fluk, gunner fluk, and raven fluk.

flatt mow the de as a flake, with fleyande lypys,
And the flesche in his botte the bowly as a bone.

Morte d'Arthur (L. E. 1. S.), l. 1088.

Two other fish, known as the flake and the megrim, but not received in polite society, follow the example of their fashionable friends in this respect.

Pop. Sci. Mo., XXIX, 113.

2. A trematoid worm; an entozoic parasitic worm of the order Trematoda, infesting various parts of man and other animals, especially the liver, bile-ducts, etc.; so called from the resemblance of its hydatid to a fluke or flounder. There are numerous species, of several genera. The common fluke is Fasciola hepatica; the liver fluke is Distoma hepaticum; the lance-shaped fluke is D. lanceolatum; the broad fluke of China is D. crassum; the fluke infesting the blood is D. brumpti; the Egyptian fluke is D. heterophyes or Heterophyes upmanni. Also called flake-worm. See cut under cecæum and Trematoda.

Lake sheep-boys stuffing themselves with blackberries, while the sheep are heking up flukes in every ditch.

Kingsley, Saint's Tragedy, ii, 8.

Craig fluke. See craig fluke.

flake³ (flōk), n. [E. dial., appar. an irreg. form of *flack*², influenced by *fluck*³, waste downy matter; see *flack*² and *fluck*³.] 1. Waste cotton.—2. A lock of hair. Halliwell. [Prov. Eng. in both senses.]

flake-chain (flōk'chan), n. A chain used in flaking a whale. See flake¹, v.

flake-rope (flōk'rōp), n. In whaling, a rope fastened around the slender part or small of the body of a whale, near the flukes, in flaking it. See flake¹, v.

flake-spade (flōk'spad), n. A spade-shaped knife used in cutting off the flukes of a whale.

flake-worm (flōk'wōrm), n. Same as flake², 2.

flukewort (flōk'wōrt), n. The marsh-pennywort, Hydrocotyle vulgaris, from a belief that it causes the flukes infesting the livers of sheep. Also floukewort, floukwort.

fluky (flō'ki), a. [< fluke¹ + -y]. 1. Formed like or having a fluke or flukes.

Then hushed in silence deep they leave the land;

No loud-mouth'd voices call with hoarse command,

To heave the fluky anchors from the sand.

Rosce, tr. of Lucan, iii.

2. Of the nature of a fluke or lucky chance; obtained by chance rather than by skill. E. D. [Slang.]

Also flouky.

flum (flūm), n. [Var. of *flum*².] 1. Deceit; flat-tery.—2. Nonsense; flummery. [Prov. Eng. and Scotch in both senses.]

flumadiddle (flūm'g-did-dl), n. 1. A dish composed of salt pork, potatoes, and molasses, eaten by the fishermen of Cape Cod. [Local, U. S.]—2. Silly or delusive nonsense; balderdash; flummery. [Slang, U. S.]

flume (flōm), n. [Scarcely found in early mod. E.; ME. flum, flom (rarely flom, flome, *< E. dial. flom*³, q. v.); a stream; a river; cf. leel, flaume, an eddy, Norw. flaum, flom, a flood, overflow, inundation, Dan. flom, a water-meadow, a swamp, MllG. flom, phlūm, phlōum, flōum, a stream, a river. These forms are somewhat irreg., some of them being plausibly referable to the root of *flow*¹, q. v., but all are in fact of L. origin. < OF. flum = Pr. flum = It. fiume, < L. flūm, n., a stream, a river. < flure, flow; see fluent.] 1. A stream; a river.

Letris, a flum from parody.

Cometh to that cite.

King Alexander, l. 6404.

Thou shalt baptise Jesus Christ.

In flume Jordan. Trenchard's Must. rec. p. 166.

2. In phys. geog., in the United States, especially in New England, a narrow defile with nearly vertical walls, the bottom of which is usually occupied by a mountain torrent. The best known flume is in the Franconia notch of the White Mountains in New Hampshire, on a branch of the Penobscot river. It is about a third of a mile in length, having walls from 20 to 50 feet in height.

3. An artificial channel for a stream of water to be applied to some industrial use. Flumes for conducting water to mill wheels are open or covered passages formed of boards, planks, or stone, in which the water falls upon the wheel. In gold-mining regions flumes for furnishing water as a power in hydraulic mining are often extensive structures of planks, carried on heavy timbers over gullies, ravines, or valleys. Flumes are also used to convey water for irrigation, etc.

flume (flōm), v. t.; pret. and pp. flummed, ppr. flumming. [< flum, n., 3.] In gold-mining, to carry off in a flume, as the water of a stream, in order to lay bare the auriferous sand and gravel forming the bed.

At this time [1850-53] the diggings for gold were chiefly along the rivers. These were "flumed"—that is, the water was taken out of the natural channel by the means of wooden flumes—and the accumulations of sand and gravel in the former beds were washed.

J. D. Whitney, En cyc. Brit., IV, 701.

flume-car (flōm'kār), n. A car designed to move on the edges of the sides of a flume, and to use the current of the water in the flume as a motive power. [Western U. S.]

fluming (flō'ming), n. See flur-mining.

fluminous (flō'mi-nūs), a. [< L. flumen (flumin-), a river, + E. -ous.] Pertaining to rivers; abounding in rivers. Webster.

flummer (flum'ēr), v. t. [< flum, n.] To humbug; flatter. [Obsolete or prov. Eng.]

Heel-Top. Hark ye, Master Muz!

Muz. Your pleasure, my very good friend?

Heel-Top. No, flummer you me: I tell thee, Matthew, 'twon't do; why, 'as to this article of ale here, how comes it about that you have raised it a penny a quart?

Fudge, Mayor of Garratt, ii.

flummery¹ (flum'ēr-i), n. [< W. llymra, llymraed, flummery, sour oatmeal boiled and jellyed; so called from its sourness; cf. llymrig, crude, raw, harsh, llymus, of a sharp quality, llym, sharp, severe, llymud, sharpen.] 1. A sort of jelly made of flour or meal; pap.

To make flummery that will thicken sauce excellently, instead of grated bread or flower: take a good handful of beaten oatmeal, put it into a quart of water, and boil it half away, then strain it through a sieve; let it stand by you for use. It is much better than grated bread or flower, or in most cases than eggs.

Lapdon, Thousand Notable Things.

There was a farmer in my parish who used to sup upon wild ducks and flummery.

Goldsmith, Citizen of the World, lviii.

2. In modern cookery, a name given to various light preparations of milk and flour with white of eggs, sweetened and flavored, and served with cream as a dessert.—3. A refuse product of wheat starch manufactures.

To this are added 4 lbs. of pipe clay, 1 lb. of flour, and 1 lb. of flummery (the refuse product from wheat starch manufactures).

Crace Calvert, Dyeing and Calico Printing, p. 200.

flummery² (flum'ēr-i), n. [Of dial. origin, prob. < E. flum, deceit, flattery, nonsense, + -ery. Perhaps suggested by *flummery*¹, but a different word.] Mere nonsense; mere flattery; empty compliment.

flummx (flum'uks), v. [E. dial., also written flummx; origin obscure.] I. trans. To perplex; embarrass; hinder; bewilder; defeat. [Slang.]

My pinion is, Sammy, that if your governor don't prove a ally-bi, he'll be what the Italians call regularly flummxed.

Dickens, Pickwick Papers, xxxiii.

II. intrans. To fail; give out or give up; die. [Slang, U. S.]

He ye men of mighty stomachs,

Men that can't be made to flummx.

Oyster War of Arcadia, New York Tribune, April, 1849.

flump (flump), v. [An imitative word; cf. *clump*¹, plump, slump.] I. trans. To throw down with violence. [Colloq.]

Belows went skimming across the room, chairs were flumped down on the floor.

Thackeray, Paris Sketch-Book, v.

II. intrans. To throw one's self down heavily; flop; as, she flumped down into a chair.

The dog squeaks, whines, jumps, flumps

Corahill Mags, June, 1861, p. 42.

flung (flung), Preterit and past participle of flung.

flunk (flungk), v. [Slang; origin obscure; perhaps a variation of *flunk*³, q. v.] I. intrans. To fail or give up; break down or back down, as from incompetence or fear; often with out; as, to flunk in a school recitation or examination; to flunk out from a contest. [Slang, U. S.]

Why, little one, you must be cracked, if you flunk out before we begin.

J. C. Neal,

II. trans. To cause to fail, as in a recitation or an examination. [Slang, U. S.]

flunk (flungk), n. [< flunk, v.] A failure or back-down; in colleges, a complete failure in a recitation or an examination. [Slang, U. S.]

In moodly meditation flunk,

Or flouting on my future flunk.

Song of Yale, 1853.

flunky, flunkey (flung'ki), n.; pl. flunkies, flunkies (-kiz). [See flunk, flunk.] Recent in literature, but prob. much older in colloquial speech; it may be connected with F. flunquer, "to flunke, run along by the side of, to support, defend or fence; to be at one's elbow for a help at need" (Cotgrave); see flunk, v. The off-propriety derivation from AS. flunc, proud, is absurd.] 1. A male servant in livery; used in contempt.

He flunk when he likes flunked.

He flunked an wet at the bell.

Turn The Two Dogs.

Much that could not have been ornamental in the temper of a great man's over-fed great man (what the Scotch name flunkie).

Curdyle, Misc., III, 55.

Hence—2. One who is mean and base-spirited; a cringing flatterer and servile imitator of those above him in rank or position; a toady; a snob.

I don't frequent operas and parties in London like you young flunkies of the aristocracy.

Thackeray, Newcomes, xliii.

He [Curdyle] who once popularized the word flunkie by ringing the vehement changes of his scorn upon it is at last forced to conceive an ideal flunkieism to squire the hectoring bon belianises of his fancy about the world.

Lowell, Study Windows, p. 138.

3. In the United States, among stock-brokers, a person who, from inexperience, makes bad investments or loses his money.

flunkydome, flunkeydom (flung'ki-dum), n. [< flunky + -dome.] 1. Flunkies collectively.—2. The grade or condition of flunkies; toadyism.

Can you deny that you've been off and on lately between flunkydome and the cause, like a donkey between two bundles of hay?

Kingsley, Alton Locke, xxvii.

flunkysm, flunkeyism (flung'ki-izm), n. [< flunky + -ism.] The character or conduct of a flunky or snob; servility; toadyism.

If the lords had not seats in the upper house, they might depend upon flunkeyism and money-worship of the average Englishman to return them to the lower.

The American, VIII, 277.

fluoborate (flō-ō-bō'rāt), n. [< fluobor-ic + -ate.] A compound of fluoboric acid with a base.

fluoboric (flō-ō-bō'rik), a. [Short for fluoboric*, < fluor + bor(on) + -ic.] Derived from or consisting of fluorine and boron.—Fluoboric acid, HBF₄, a colorless oily liquid, which is easily decomposed by contact with moisture, breaking up into boric and hydrofluoric acid. With alkalis it forms salts called fluoborates.

fluoboride (flō-ō-bō'rid or -rid), n. [< fluobor-ic + -ide.] 1. A salt of fluoboric acid.

fluocarbonate (flō-ō-kār'bō-nāt), n. [Short for fluocarbonate*, < fluor + carbonate.] In mineral, a carbonate containing fluorine as an essential part. See fluophosphate.

fluocerin (flō-ō-sēr'in), n. [< fluor + cer(ium) + -in.] Same as fluocerite.

fluocerite (flō-ō-sēr'it), n. [Short for fluocerite*, < fluor + cer(ium) + -ite.] A fluoride of cerium and the allied metals, occurring massive and in hexagonal crystals in Sweden and Colorado (tysonite). It is often altered to a fluorocarbonate called bastnaesite or hamartite.

fluohydric (flō-ō-lī'drik), a. Same as fluorhydric, hydrofluoric.

fluophosphate (flō-ō-fos'fāt), n. [Short for fluophosphate*, < fluor + phosphate.] In mineral, a phosphate containing fluorine as an essential part. For example, the mineral wagnerite is a fluorophosphate, the formula being either Mg₂P₂O₇ + MgF₂ or Mg(MgF)₂P₂O₇. The precise part played by fluorine in the chemical combination may be open to question.

fluor (flō'or), n. [L. fluor, a flow, a flux, < L. fluere, flow; see fluent.] 1†. A liquid state.—2†. Menstrual flux.—3. In mineral, fluor-spar.

Fluor albus (literally, white flux), in pathol., whites or leucorrhœa.

fluorated (flō'ō-rā-ted), a. [< fluor-ic + -ate + -ed.] In chem., combined with hydrofluoric acid. See hydrofluoric.

fluoresce (flō-ō-res'), v. i.; pret. and pp. fluoresced, pp. fluorescing. [< fluor (fluor-spar) + inceptive term, -esce. The deriv. fluorescence was the first word of this group to be used.] To exhibit the phenomena of fluorescence; be or become fluorescent.

Many beautiful effects are . . . produced by blowing tubes in uranium glass, which fluoresces with a blue green light.

S. P. Thompson, Elect. and Mag., p. 246.

The ultra-violet rays of the spectrum can . . . be seen without the intervention of any fluorescing substance through a glass.

Lowell, Light (trans.), p. 185.

fluorescein (flō-ō-res'ē-in), n. [< fluoresce + -in.] The anhydride of resorcin phthalic acid, C₂₀H₁₂O₅. It is a coal-tar product, but is little used in dyeing. From it are derived the eosins.

Fluorescein, some of the Eosins, Magda red, and Resorcin blue also show a marked fluorescence when in solution.

Lowell, Coal-tar Colours (trans.), p. 25.

fluorescence (flō-ō-res'ens), n. [= F. fluoresce + -ence.] Sp. Flg. fluorescence; as fluorescent (t) + -ence.] The property possessed by some transparent substances of becoming self luminous while they are exposed to the direct action of light-rays. See phosphorescence. It is especially excited by the violet and ultra violet rays of the spectrum, and is explained by the change in refrangibility (that is, wave length) of the incident rays by the substance under experiment. Thus if a beam of sunlight fall upon a solution of eosin or sulphate of quinine, its path through the liquid is marked by a bluish opalescent light. Again, if a paper moistened with the solution is exposed to the ultra-violet rays of the spectrum, it becomes blue, since these rays are diminished in refrangibility so as to become visible; by this means the ultra-violet spectrum (given by prisms of quartz) can be studied. The delicate blue surface-color of some fluor-spar and the yellowish-green surface-color of glass colored with uranium oxide (canary glass) are phenomena of the same nature. For some years previous to 1852 the phenomenon was termed epilotic dispersion.

I am almost inclined to coin a word, and call the appearance fluorescence.

Stokes, Philos. Trans., 1852, p. 479, note.

fluorescent (flō-ō-res'ent), a. [= F. fluoresce + -ent.] Possessing the property of fluorescence; exhibiting fluorescence.

In every case the fluorescent light appears to belong to a less refrangible part of the spectrum than does the incident light which gave rise to it, thus affording an instance of dissipation, or degradation of energy.

Tait, Light, § 199.

Fluorescent solutions rapidly absorb those rays which are the effective cause of their luminosity.

Daniell, Prin. of Physics, p. 456.

Fluorescent eyepiece, a form of eyepiece, as that of Sorot, used with the spectroscopic in examining the ultra-violet spectrum made visible by fluorescence.

fluorhydric (flō-ō-lī'drik), a. Same as hydrofluoric.

fluoric (flō-ō'rik), a. [< fluor + -ic.] Pertaining to or obtained from fluor (fluor-spar).—Fluoric acid. See hydrofluoric acid, under hydrofluoric.

fluoride (flō'ō-rid or -rid), n. [< fluor + -ide.] In chem., a compound of fluorine with another element.

fluorine, fluorine (flō'ō-rin), n. [*< fluor + -in*², *-ine*².] Chemical symbol, F; atomic weight, 19. A gaseous element, not known in a free state, since its isolation is a matter of great difficulty and of some doubt. It forms with other elements a group of compounds called fluorides. The commonest of these is calcium fluoride, or fluor-spar. Fluorine occurs abundantly in the mineral kingdom, as in fluor-spar, cryolite, and other minerals, and also in minute quantity in the teeth and bones of animals.

fluorite (flō'ō-rīt), n. [*< fluor + -ite*².] Same as fluor-spar.

fluoroid (flō'ō-roid), n. [< fluor + -oid.] In crystal, a solid contained under twenty-four triangles; a tetrahedron (which see): so called because it is a frequent form in fluor-spar.

fluorous (flō'ō-rus), a. [< fluor + -ous.] Obtained from or containing fluor-spar or fluorine.

fluor-spar (flō'ōr-spār), n. [< fluor, a flow, flux (see def.), + *spar*¹.] A common mineral, the fluoride of calcium, CaF₂, found in great beauty in Derbyshire, England, and hence also called Derbyshire spar. It occurs both massive and crystallized, in simple forms of the isometric system, namely the cube, octahedron, dodecahedron, etc., and in combinations of these. Pure fluor-spar contains 48.7 per cent. of fluorine and 51.3 of calcium. It is of frequent occurrence, especially in connection with metalliferous beds, as of silver, tin, lead, and cobalt ores. It is sometimes colorless and transparent, but more frequently exhibits tints of yellow, green, blue, and red. From the general prevalence of a blue tint in the Derbyshire specimens, it is there known as blue-john. It is often beautifully banded, especially when in nodules, which are much prized for the manufacture of vases, and occasionally used for beads, brooch-stones, and other ornamental purposes, although it is of inferior hardness. Some varieties exhibit a bluish fluorescence; and all kinds phosphoresce on gentle heating, especially the variety chlorophane, which emits a beautiful green light. The name fluor has reference to its use as a flux to promote the fusion of certain refractory minerals. Also called fluorite.

fluosilicate (flō-ō-sil'i-kāt), n. [< fluosilic-ic + -ate.] 1. In chem., a compound of fluosilicic acid with some base.—2. In mineral, a silicate containing fluorine as an essential part. See fluophosphate.

fluosilicic (flō-ō-sil'i-sik), a. [Short for fluosilicic*, < fluor + silic(ion) + -ic.] Composed of or derived from silicon and fluorine. Fluosilicic acid, SiF₄, an acid composed of silicon and fluorine. It may be obtained by applying a gentle heat to a mixture of one part of powdered fluor-spar, one of silica, and two of sulphuric acid, in a retort. It is a colorless, pungent, suffocating gas, which times when it escapes into humid air, and is rapidly decomposed by water.

fluotantallic (flō-ō-tan-tal'ik), a. [Short for fluotantallic*, < fluor + tantal(um) + -ic.] Derived from fluorine and tantalum. Fluotantallic acid, an acid obtained by treating tantalum with hydrofluoric acid.

fluotitanic (flō-ō-ti-tan'ik), a. [Short for fluotitanic*, < fluor + titan(um) + -ic.] Obtained from titanium and fluorine.

flur, n. A Middle English form of flower, flour, flur-bird (fler'hārd), n. [< flur (origin unknown; cf. E. dial. fluring, a brood) + *bird*¹.] A decoy-bird. Goldsmith.

flurent, a. An obsolete form of flower.

flurichet, n. A Middle English form of flourish.

“flushed with victory,” where the word is commonly associated with flush], as if it meant “thrown into a glow”; hence “heated, excited”; it is, however, a corruption, by a natural confusion with flush], of flesh, r. t., encourage by giving flesh to, excite, as dogs, by feeding with flesh; cf. “flushed, flushed, encouraged, put in heart, elated with good success” (Bailey). See flesh, r. t.] To encourage; elate; excite the spirits of; animate with joy; originally the same as flesh.

The Indian Neighbourhood, who were mortal Enemies to the Spaniards, and had been glusht by their Successes against them, through the assistance of the Privateers, for several years, were our fast Friends, and ready to receive and assist us.

Such things as can only feed his pride and glush his ambition,

Strutt, Sports and Pastimes p. 84.

The full possession of the Tennessee River by the Union gun-boats for the moment hopelessly divided the Confederate commands, and like a flushed covey of birds the rebel generals started on their several lines of retreat without concert or rallying point.

flush⁵ (flush), n. [*flush*⁵, v.] 1. The act of starting or flushing a bird.—2. A bird, or a flock of birds, suddenly started or sprung.

As when a Falcon hath with nimble flight
Flowne at a flush of Ducks foreby the brooke, Spenser, F. Q., V, ii, 54.

flush⁶ (flush), n. [E. dial., perhaps an extension of the notion 'a good many,' implied, by an easy exaggeration, in 'a flush' of cards; see *flush*¹, n. The same notion is derivable, perhaps more easily, from 'a flush' or flock of birds (see *flush*⁵, n.), or from *flush*¹, v., bloom, *flush*¹, v., in vigorous growth.] 1. A great number. Hallirell. [Prov. Eng.]-2. Abundance; exuberance.

I thought o' the bonny bit thorn that our father rooted

Flustra (flus'trā), n. [NL., said to be formed from AS. flustrian (once, glossing L. phycere), plait, braid.]

Sea-mat (Flustra foliacea).

The typical genus of polyzoans or bryozoans of the family Flustridae; the sea-mats. The species assume a branching form, with broad, flat ramifications, making a matted surface. One of the commonest species is F. foliacea, found on the sea-coast among seaweeds, which it greatly resembles; but the frond when closely examined is found to be clothed all over its surface with a network of quadrangular cells minutely toothed at the angles, each inhabited by a little individual polyzoan having a mouth fringed with tentacles.

flustrate, flustration. See flustrate, flustration.

Flustridæ (flus'tri-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Flustra + -idæ.] A family of Polyzoa, of the suborder Chilostomata and order Gymnolamata, typified by the genus Flustra; the sea-mats or lemon-weeds. They have a membranous zoarium, either expanded and foliaceous or ligulate, usually erect, sometimes decurrent on its base of support, and unilaminar or bilaminar, with the zoecia quincuncially disposed, without a raised border, more or less open and membranous in front, and the avicularia, when present, usually vicarious.

Flustrina (flus'tri-nā), n. pl. [NL., < Flustra + -ina.] 1. A superfamily of Flustridae containing flattened forms with even surface and quadrate cells.—2. [Used as a singular.] A genus of mollusks. D'Orbigny, 1852.

flustrum (flus'trum), n. A colloquial variant of fluster.

We may take the thing quietly, without being in a flustrum. Miss Edgeworth, Absentee, v.

flute¹ (flüt), n. [Mod. E. (taking the place of earlier flout¹, q. v., and flout², q. v.), < F. flute, now written flüte, a contr. of earlier flöite (two syllables, orig. three), < OF. flöite, flaiite, flakute, and (with false silent s) flöiste, flaiiste, flakuste = Fr. Sp. flauta = Vg. flauta, flauta = It. flauto, m. (ML. refl. flauta), a flute; cf. OD. fluyt, D. fluit = LG. flöite, flöite = MHG. flöite, G. flöte = Dan. flöite = Sw. flöjt = Bohem. flauta = Pol. flut, etc., of F. origin; verbal n. of OF. flüiter, blow the flute, lit. blow, prob. transposed from flatur*, < ML. flatur*, an assumed verb, < L. flatus (flatus), a blowing, < flare, blow, breathe, = E. blow¹.] 1. In music, an instrument of the pipe kind, in which the tone is produced by the impact of a current of air upon the edge of a hole in the side of a tube. See pipe, fife. Flutes are either direct or transverse, the former (dates-a-bee) having a mouthpiece or whistle at the upper end of the tube, which is held straight away from the player's mouth, and the latter (transverse flutes) having a mouth-hole in the side of the tube, which is held across the player's body. In both species finger-holes in the tube control the pitch of the tones; and in both increased force in blowing raises the pitch an octave. The exact explanation of the production of the tone is somewhat uncertain. It is asserted that the stream of air, being usually flat, acts like a free reed in the opening, playing back and forth like a solid tongue.

What time ye hear the sound of the cornet, flute, harp, . . . and all kinds of music, ye fall down and worship the golden image. Dan. iii. 5.

The ears were silver,
Which to the tune of flutes kept stroke. Shak., A. and C., ii. 2.

Specifically (a) In anc. music, a direct flute with a conical wooden tube having a varying number of finger-holes. Sometimes two tubes were attached to one mouthpiece. (b) In medieval music, one of a family of direct flutes, comprising treble, alto, tenor, and bass varieties, all having conical wooden tubes with several finger holes. The modern flageolet and the penny whistle are derivatives of the treble kind. (c) In modern music, a transverse flute, having a conical or cylindrical wooden or metal tube with holes controlled in part by levers, and having a compass of about three octaves upward from middle C; also called the German flute. The change from the medieval direct flutes took place early in the eighteenth century. The best model for orchestral use was invented by Theobald Boehm in 1832. The piccolo-flute or piccolo is a flute giving tones an octave higher than the ordinary flute.

2. In organ-building, a stop with stopped wooden pipes, having a flute-like tone, usually of four-foot pitch. The number of varieties is very great; they are usually named descriptively, as flute d'amour, flute harmonique, doppel-flute, etc.

3. In arch., one of a series of curved furrows, usually semicircular in plan, of which each is separated from the next by a narrow fillet. When such flutes are partially filled up by a smaller convex-curved molding, they are said to be cubbed. In an ancient architecture the flute is used in the Ionic, Composite, Corinthian, and Roman Doric orders, but never in the Greek Doric. Compare channel.

The columns, plain and with twisted flutes, . . . have capitals such as we might look for in much earlier Romanesque. E. A. Freeman, Venice, p. 255.

4. A similar groove in any material, as in a woman's ruffle.

If it [a drop of liquid] be instantaneously illuminated by electric sparks, the separate vibration forms will be seen presenting half as many beads and flutes as are presented when the images are superposed through the employment of a continuous light. E. J. Rieu, Brit. A. M. 729.

5. In decorative art, a concave depression relatively long and of any form, the sides not necessarily parallel. Compare gadroon.

Flutes, beads, and small leaves in furniture carving. Soc. Arts Rep., Exhibit, 1867, p. 55.

6. A kind of long, thin French roll.—7. A shuttle used in tapestry-weaving. A separate shuttle is employed for each color of which the wool is composed.—8. A tall and very narrow wine-glass, used especially for sparkling wines. Also called flute-glass.

A light fluttery material.

J. Hewitt, Ancient Armour, I. 341.

fluty (dō'ti), a. [< flute + -y]. Soft and clear in tone, like a flute.

fluvial (flō'vi-əl), a. [= F. fluvial = Pr. Sp. Pg. fluvial = It. fluviale, < L. fluvialis, < fluvius, OL. fluvios, a river, < fluere, flow; see fluent.] Relating or pertaining to rivers; as, fluvial waters; fluvial navigation or fisheries.

The United States happily has not yet experienced such serious fluvial irregularities as have long wasted southern and central Europe. The Nation, Dec. 6, 1883.

Next in interest to the Agostic types of Sicilian Mints are what may be called the Fluvial types, under which that main source of the fertility of Sicily—its springs and rivers—was represented.

C. T. Newton, Art and Archaeol., p. 422.

fluvialist (flō'vi-əl-ist), n. [< fluvial + -ist.] One who explains geological phenomena by the action of existing streams.

fluvialic (flō'vi-ət'ik), a. [< L. fluvialis, < fluvios, a river; see fluvial.] Fluvial; fluviality. [Rare.]

fluvialite (flō'vi-a-til), a. [= F. fluvialite = Pg. fluvialit = It. fluviale, < L. fluvialis, of or belonging to a river, < fluvius, a river; see fluvial.] Of riverine nature; growing in or near fresh water; produced by river action; fluvial: as, fluvialite species or deposits.

A lake is the landscape's most beautiful and expressive feature. It is earth's eye. . . . The fluvialite trees next the shore are the slender eyelashes which fringe it. Thoreau, Walden, p. 202.

The river is, itself, a powerful agent of direct denudation—fluvialite denudation, as it is sometimes termed. Huxley, Physiography, p. 135.

Fluviatilidae (flō'vi-a-til'i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < L. fluvialis + -idae.] A family of fresh-water or river sponges, distinguished from the Lacus-tridae by the birotulate shape of the skeletal spicules.

Fluvicola (flō'vik'ō-lā), n. [NL., < L. fluvius, a river, + colere, inhabit. 1. The typical genus of watercreps of the subfamily Fluvicolinae, Water crep (Fluvicola chimacura).

established by Swainson in 1827. F. chimacura and F. pura are characteristic examples. The plumage is black and white. The birds inhabit the pampas and other open places, generally in the vicinity of water.

2. A genus of crustaceans. Fluvicolinae (flō'vik'ō-lī-nē), n. pl. [NL., < Fluvicola + -inae.] A subfamily of South American elasmobranch tyrant flycatchers, of the family Tyrannidae, taking name from the genus Fluvicola; the watercreps. Also called Nectarinae and Taniplophorinae.

fluvicoline (flō'vik'ō-līn), a. [As Fluvicola + -ine.] Fluvial or fluvialite; inhabiting rivers, or frequenting their banks; specifically, of or pertaining to the Fluvicolinae.

fluviomarine (flō'vi-o-ma-rēn'), a. [< L. fluvius, a river, + marinus, of the sea; see fluvial and marine.] In geol., an epithet applied to such deposits as have been formed in estuaries, or on the bottom of the sea at a greater or less distance from the embouchure, by rivers bearing with them the detritus of the land.

fluvioterrestrial (flō'vi-o-tes-tri-āl), a. [< L. fluvius, a river, + terrestris, of the earth; see fluvial and terrestrial.] Pertaining to the land-surface of the globe and its fresh waters; not marine or maritime.

The marine and fluvial are entirely independent of the . . . Tell. Proc. Biol. Soc., 1885, II, 20.

flux (flū'x), n. and a. [< ME. flux, also flur (see flux), a flow, flood, of the tide, and in medical science, < OL. flux, < F. flux, Sp. Pg. fluxa, It. fluxa, < L. fluxa, a flow, a flowing, < fluere, pp. fluere, flow; see fluant.] 1. < L. fluxus (in card), a double of flux. I. n. 1. The act of flowing; a flowing, as of a fluid; flow in general, but now most commonly an occasional flow; an outpouring or effusion of anything.

The cause of the extraordinary swiftness of this lake is the continual flux of the snow-water descending from those mountains. Coryat, Cruities, I, 84.

No flux and reflux of thought, half meditative, half capricious. De Quincey, Rhetoric.

Hence—2. Continual change; the mode of being of that which is instantaneous, ceasing to exist as soon as it begins to exist. This is specifically termed Heraclean flux, from the doctrine of the ancient Greek philosopher Heracitus that there is no being or permanence, but that all things are transitory and fleeting.

For time considered in itself is but the flux of that very instant wherein the motion of the heaven began. Hooker, Eccles. Polity, v. 69.

Certain it is that matter is in a perpetual flux and never at a stay. Bacon, Vicissitude of Things (ed. 1887).

All things, as the old skeptics said, are in ceaseless flux; and yet, to find truth, we must find something permanent. Leslie Stephen, Eng. Thought, i. § 28.

3. In pathol., a morbid or abnormal issue or discharge of matter, as blood, mucus, or pus, from any mucous surface of the internal vessels or viscera: as, the bloody flux (dysentery).

It bifeil, the fadir of Publius for to lisse travelid with fevers and dissenterie or flux. Wyclif, Deeds [Acts] xxviii. 8 (Oxf.).

The next year [A. D. 987] was calamitous, bringing strange fluxes upon men, and murren upon cattle. Milton, Hist. Eng., vi.

4. Matter which is discharged in a flux; defluxion; excrement.

Civet is of a baser birth than tar; the very uncleanly flux of a cat. Shak., As you Like it, iii. 2.

5. A flowing together; concourse; confluence.

Thus misery doth part the flux of company. Shak., As you Like it, ii. 1.

6. Fusion; conversion to a liquid state by the operation of heat.—7. In metal., any substance or mixture used to promote the fusion of metals or minerals, as alkalis, borax, tartar, and other saline matter, or, in large operations, limestone or fluor-spar. Alkaline fluxes are either the crude, the white, or the black flux. When tartar is delugated with half its weight of niter, a mixture of charcoal and carbonate of potash remains, which is often called black flux; when an equal weight of niter is used, the whole of the charcoal is burned off, and carbonate of potassium remains, which, when thus procured, is called white flux.

8. In math., a vector which is referred to a unit of area.—Bloody flux, dysentery.—Hepatic flux, bilious flux.

II. a. Flowing; changing; inconstant; variable.

Our argument for such a translation is the flux nature of living languages. Abp. Newcome, Eng. Biblical Trans., p. 233.

flux (flūks), v. [< flux, n.] I. trans. 1. To flood; overflow.

Surely, that God is merciful that will admit offences to be expiated by the sigh and fluxed eyes. Feltham, Resolves, i. 89.

2. In med., to cause a flux or evacuation from; salivate; purge.

He might fashionably and genteelly have been duelled or fluxed into another world. South, Sermons, II, 215.

3. To clear or clean out by or as if by an evacuation; relieve by purging, literally or figuratively.

'Twas he that gave our nation purges, And fluxed the House of many a burgess. S. Butler, Hudibras, II, I, 362.

4. To melt; fuse; make fluid.

One part of mineral alkali will flux two of siliceous earth with effervescence. Kirwan.

II. intrans. To flow or change. [Rare.]

The invading waters . . . fluxing along the wall from below the road bridge. R. D. Blackmore, Lorna Doone, I.

There is a mystery about it which has not yet been penetrated, that monarchy should be so universal and indestructible in the East, while in the West it has been so fluxing and unstable. J. Hadden, Essays, p. 365.

fluxation (flūks'ā-shon), n. [< flux + -ation.] A flowing or passing away; flux.

They [the Siamese] believe a continual fluxation and transmigration of souls from eternity. C. Leslie, Short Method with Deists.

fluxibility (flūks-sil'i-bil'i-ti), n. [= Sp. fluxibilitad = Pg. fluxibilitad = It. flussibilità, < ML. fluxibilitas, < fluxibilis, fluxible; see fluxible.] The quality of being fluxible, or admitting of flux or change; specifically, the quality of being fusible; fusibility.

For the fluxibility of human nature is so great that it is no wonder if errors should have crept in, the ways being so many; but it is a great wonder of God that none should ever creep in. Hammond, Works, II, 693.

fluxible (flūks'si-bil), a. [= OF. fluxibile = OSP. fluxibile = Pg. fluxível = It. flussibile, < ML. fluxibilis, fluxible, < L. fluxus, pp. of fluere, flow; see fluent, flux.] Capable of undergoing flux or change; specifically, fusible. [Obsolete in figurative uses.]

But the evening dewes cause them [pearls] to be soft and fluxible. Holland, tr. of Ammianus, p. 238.

Good Education and acquisit Wisdom ought to correct the fluxible fault, if any such be, of our watry situation. Milton, Free Commonwealth.

fluxibleness (flūks'si-bil-nes), n. Same as fluxibility. [Rare.]

fluxile (flūks'sil), a. [< LL. fluxilis, fluid, < L. fluxus, pp. of fluere, flow; see fluent, flux.] Same as fluxible.

fluxility (flūks-sil'i-ti), n. [< fluxile + -ity.] Same as fluxibility.

Our experiments seem to teach that the supposed aversion of nature to a vacuum is but accidental, or in consequence partly of the weight and fluidity, or at least fluxility, of the bodies here below. Boyle, Works, I, 75.

fluxing-bed (flūks'ing-bed), n. In the manufacture of soda, one of the two parts into which the sole of the furnace is divided. It is lower than the other part, and slightly coneave.

fluxion (flūks'shon), n. [< F. fluxion = Sp. fluxion = Pg. fluxão = It. flussione, < L. fluxio(n-), var. of fluxio(n-), a flowing, < fluere, pp. fluxus, flow; see fluent, fluxuate.] 1. The act of flowing; fluxation; change.—2. That which flows; that which changes; a flux.

Some faine that these should be the cataracts of heaven, which were all opened at Noe's flood. But I think them rather to be such fluxions and eruptions as Aristotle, in his booke de Mundo, saith to chance in the sea.

Hakluyt's Voyages, II, ii. 21.

And this is wrought the rather, by means of those fluxions which rest upon waters, looking-glasses, or any such mirrors by way of repercussion.

Holland, tr. of Plutarch, p. 594.

Specifically—(a) In med.: (1) An abnormal flow or determination of blood or other humor to any organ, as the brain; active hyperemia. (2) A catarrh. (b) The running or reduction of metals to a fluid state; fusion. Craig. (c) Something, as an indication, which constantly varies. [Rare.]

Less to be counted than the fluxions of sun-dials. De Quincey.

3. In math., the rate of change of a continuously varying quantity; the differential coefficient relatively to the time. A fluxion is denoted by a dot placed over the symbol of the fluent or variable. This term and the method of fluxions (which see, below) were invented by Sir Isaac Newton.

Fluxions themselves should be regarded as generally finite, according to what seems to have been the ultimate view of Newton. Sir W. R. Hamilton.

When a quantity changes from time to time, its rate of change is called the fluxion of the quantity.

W. K. Clifford, Lectures, II, 15.

Corresponding fluxions, rates at which two connected quantities may change together; simultaneous differentials. Fluent of a fluxion. See fluent.—Inverse method of fluxions, the method of treating problems of integration by means of fluxions.—Method of fluxions, Newton's form of the calculus, hardly distinguishable from the differential calculus of Leibnitz. It makes use of the conceptions of the doctrine of limits in place of fictitious infinitesimals of different orders. See calculus, 3. Differential, and limit.—Second fluxion, the rate of change of the rate of change of a variable quantity; the second differential coefficient relatively to the time; denoted by two dots over the symbol of the fluent.

fluxional (flūks'shon-əl), a. [< fluxion + -al.]

1. Subject to flux or change; variable; inconstant. [Rare.]

The merely human, the temporary and fluxional. Calverley.

2. In math., pertaining to or solved by the method of fluxions. Fluxional or fluxionary calculus or analysis, the method of fluxions (which see, under fluxion). Fluxional equation. See equation.

fluxionary (flūks'shon-ā-rī), a. [= F. fluxionaire, as fluxion + -ary.] Same as fluxional.

The skill with which detention or conscious arrest is given to the evanescent, external projection to what is internal, outline to what is fluxionary, and body to what is vague—all this depends entirely on the command over language, as the one sole means of embodying ideas. De Quincey, Style, iv.

fluxionist (flūks'shon-ist), n. [< fluxion + -ist.] One skilled in fluxions.

Whether an algebraist, fluxionist, geometrician, or demomprator of any kind can expect indulgence for obscure principles or incorrect reasonings. Bp. Berkeley, Analyst, Query 43.

fluxion-structure (flūks'shon-struk'tūr), n. Same as fluidal structure. See fluidal.

fluxivet (flūks'siv), a. [< L. fluxus, pp. of fluere, flow, + -iv.] Flowing; wanting substance or solidity.

These fletters often bathed she in her fluxive eyes.
Shak., Lover's Complaint, l. 50.

These arguments are as fluxive as liquor spilt upon a table.
E. Janson, Discoveries.

flux-spoon (fluks'spōn), n. A small ladle for dipping up a sample of molten metal for testing.

fluxure (fluks'sūr), n. [L. fluxura, a flowing, < fluxus, pp. of fluere, flow: see fluor.] 1. The quality of being fluid. E. Janson.—2. A flowing or fluid matter: as, a fluxure from a wound.

fluxweed (fluks'wēd), n. A name given to various plants used as remedies for dysentery.

fly¹ (flī), v.; pret. flew, pp. flown, ppr. flying. [Early mod. E. also flic, flye: < ME. flyen, flēn, flyen, flegen, fleen, floun, flon, flegen, etc. (pret. fleg, fleh, flah, flah, flaz, flay, fley, fleygh, flich, flew, flure, etc., pl. flygen, flygen, flouwen, flawen, flow, etc.), fly, < AS. flēagan, flōagan (pret. fleāg, fleah, pl. flygen, pp. flygen), fly, rarely (by confusion with flōan) flee, = OFries. flaiga, NFries. fleg = D. fliegen = MLG. fliegen, LG. fliegen = OHG. fliegen, MHG. fliegen, G. fliegen = Teut. fljaga = Norw. fljaga = Sw. flyga = Dan. flyge, fly, = Goth. flagan*, inferred from derived factitive flaugjan in comp. us-flaugjan, drive about, lit. cause to fly about, as the wind does light substances. The common Teut. root is flag*, the word being quite different from flec, AS. fleōn, etc., Goth. flīhan, Tent. ✓ fluh*, with which, however, it has been partly confused from the AS. period: see flec. Hence *fly*¹, n., *fly*², fledge = ridge = flish, flush = *fly*³, and *flay*² = Sc. fley, fley.] I. intrans. 1. To move through the air by the aid of wings, as birds.

And feblest foule of flyght is that fleegeth or swymmeth; And that is the pekok and the polumie; prondie ride men thei bitoketh.
Piers Plowman (B), xii. 239.

Ye wish they had held themselves longer in, and not so dangerously flown abroad before the feathers of the cause had been grown.
Hooker, Eccles. Polity, Pref., viii.

From that which highest flew to that which lowest crept.
Dryden, Polyolbion, li. 154.

Ravens, crows, and kites
Fly o'er our heads, and downward look on us.
Shak., J. C., v. 1.

2. To pass or move in air by the force of wind or any other impulse: as, clouds fly before the wind; a ball flies from a cannon, an arrow from a bow; the explosion made the gravel fly.

As, fore'd from wind-guns, lead itself can fly,
And ponderous slugs out swiftly through the sky.
Pope, Dunciad, i. 151.

Quick flew the shuttle from her arm of snow.
William Morris, Earthly Paradise, l. 151.

Then the blue Bullets flew,
And the trooper-jackets reddened at the touch of the leaden Rifle-breath.
G. H. McMaster, Carmen Bellicosum.

3. To rise, spring, shoot, or be cast in air, as smoke, sparks, or other light objects.

His fashon on a flint he softly smiteth,
That from the cold stone sparks of fire do fly.
Shak., Lucrece, l. 177.

Their [martyrs'] ashes flew —No marble tells us whither. Cowper, Task, v. 726.

4. To move or pass with swiftness or alacrity; go rapidly or at full speed; rush; dart: as, to fly to the relief of a distressed friend; the ship flies before the wind; recriminations flew about.

The Sarazin, sore daunted with the buffe, Snatcheth his sword, and fiercely to him flies.
Spenser, F. Q., i. li. 17.

Madam, if you bid me go, I will run; if you bid me run, I'll fly (if I can) upon your errand. Howell, Letters, li. 65.

Only this I know, that Calms are very frequent there [near the line], as also Tornadoses and sudden Gusts, in which the Winds fly in a moment quite round the Compass.

Fool! knave! and dunce!
In a child's fingers. Lowell, Oriental Apologue.

5. To depart suddenly or swiftly; take flight; escape; flee: as, the rogue has flown; his fortune will soon fly.

Mark Antony is in your tents, my lord!
Fly therefore, noble Cassius, fly far off.
Shak., J. C., v. 3.

Wouldst thou then be free from envy and scorn, from anger and strife, fly from the occasions of them.
Bp. Atterbury, Sermons, I. x.

Where, my deluded sense, was reason flown?
Where the high majesty of David's throne?
Prior, Solomon, ii.

Heaven's light forever shines, earth's shadows fly.
Shelley, Adonais, lii.

6. To part suddenly or with violence; burst or be rent into fragments or shreds: as, the bottle flew into a thousand pieces; the sail flew in tatters.

The splinter'd spear-shafts crack and fly.
Tennyson, Sir Galahad.

'O bubble world,
Whose colours in a moment break and fly!
Why, who said that? I know not—true enough!
Tennyson, Queen Mary, v. 2.

Overheated steel is apt to fly or crack in hardening.
Morgan, Mining Tools, p. 55.

7. To flutter; wave or play, as a flag in the wind.

High in the air Britannia's standard flies.
Pope, Windsor Forest, l. 110.

Soon as soft vernal breezes warm the sky,
Britannia's colours on the zephyrus fly.
Addison, The Campaign.

White sails flying on the yellow sea.
Tennyson, Geraint.

8. To be evanescent; fade; disappear: said of colors: as, that color is sure to fly when the fabric is washed. [Colloq.]—9. To hunt with a falcon; hawk.

We'll c'en to t like French falconers, fly at anything we see.
Shak., Hamlet, ii. 2.

A flying moor (moor), see moor 1. As the crow flies. See crow 2. Flying adder. Same as adder fly. Flying blister, bridge, buttress, dustman, Dutchman, etc. See the nouns. Flying column, in her, a bearing representing a short column or pillar with wings. Flying jib, sap, etc. See the nouns. To come off with flying colors, to succeed or triumph: in allusion to the carrying of unfurled flags by troops.—To fly about (about), to change direction frequently: said of the wind.—To fly around. See to fly round. To fly at, to spring or rush at with hostile intention: as, a hen flies at a dog or a cat; a dog flies at a man. To fly at the brook, to hunt water-fowl with hawks.

Believe me, birds, for flying at the brook,
I saw not better sport these seven years' day.
Shak., 2 Hen. VI., ii. 1.

To fly in the face of. (a) To insult. (b) To resist; set at defiance; oppose with violence; act in direct opposition to.

Fly in nature's face,
But how if nature fly in my face first?
Then nature's the aggressor.
Dryden, Spanish Friar.

Their [men's] Consciences still fly in their faces, and rebuke them sharply for their sins.
Stillinger, Sermons, I. ii.

To fly light, to sail, as a ship, with but little cargo or ballast.—To fly off. (a) To depart suddenly; run away.

'Tis a poor courage
Flies off for one repulse.
Fletcher, Wildgoose Chase, iv. 1.

(b) To revolt. (c) To evaporate or volatilize.

The metallic oxide is combined with a volatile acid, like the acetic, which flies off and leaves it insoluble in the fibre.
O'Neill, Dyeing and Calico Printing, p. 351.

To fly off the handle, to go beyond bounds in speech or action; be carried away by excitement or passion; break out or away from constraint of any kind: from the flying off the handle of a loose hammer-head when a blow is struck with it. [Colloq., U. S.]

When I used to tell minister this, as he was flying off the handle, he'd say, Sam, you're as correct as Euclid, but as cold and dry.
Haltibouton (Sam Slick), Human Nature, p. 149.

To fly on (theat.), to move on side-scenes quickly in changing a scene in sight of the audience. To fly open, to open suddenly or freely: as, the doors flew open.

No door but flies open to her, her presence is above a charm.
B. Jonson, Cynthia's Revels, li. 1.

To fly out. (a) To rush or dart out. (b) To break out in anger, uproar, or license.

They [the apostles] never fly out into any extravagant passion, never betray any weakness or fear.
Stillinger, Sermons, I. iv.

So you will fly out! Can't you be cool like me? What the devil good can passion do? Sheridan, The Rivals, ii. 1.

To fly round or around, to be active or bustling; move briskly. [Colloq., U. S.]

Come, gals, fly round, and let's get Mrs. Clavers some supper.
A New Home, p. 13.

Lawyer Dean he flew round like a parched pea on a shovel.
H. B. Stowe, Oldtown, p. 44.

To fly upon. (a) To pounce upon; seize.

And the people flew upon the spoil. 1 Sam. xiv. 32.

(b) To assail; abuse.

David sent messengers out of the wilderness to salute our master; and he railed on them [margin, flew upon them]. 1 Sam. xxv. 14

To let fly. (a) Absolutely, to make an attack or assault, with an object, to discharge; throw, drive, or utter with violence: as, to let fly a stone; he let fly a torrent of abuse.

Whose arrows made these wounds? speak, or, by Dian, Without distinction I'll let fly at ye all!
Fletcher, Sea Voyage, ii. 2.

They, therefore, in angry manner, let fly at them again, counting them as bad as the men in the cage.

Bunyan, Pilgrim's Progress, p. 156

(b) Naut., to let go suddenly: as, let fly the sheets.

To make the feathers (or fur) fly, to make an effective assault or attack; produce great confusion, disturbance, or damage by a vigorous onslaught, as with tongue or pen, or by physical force: in allusion to the flying of a bird's feathers or of an animal's fur when struck by shot.

II. trans. 1. To cause to move through or float in the air: as, to fly carrier-pigeons; to fly a flag or a kite.

He make a match with you; meete me to-morrow
At Chevy Chase; He flye my Hawke with you.
T. Heywood, Woman Killed with Kindness.

2. To attack by the flight of a falcon or hawk; fly at.

If a man can tame this monster, and bring her to feed at the hand, and govern her, and with her fly other tending fowl and kill them, it is somewhat worth.

Bacon, Fragment of an Essay on Fame, ed. 15c7).

Fly everything you see to the mark, and censure it freely.
B. Jonson, Magnetick Laby. Ind.

The Parliament flying upon several Men, and then letting them alone, does as a Hawk that flies a Covey of Partridges.
Selden, Table-Talk, p. 80.

3. To flee from; shun; avoid as by flight; get away from: as, to fly the sight of one we hate.

This is not well, rash and undaunted boy,
To fly the favours of so good a king.
Shak., All's Well, iii. 2.

Costly Apparel let the Fair One fly.
Congreve, tr. of Ovid's Art of Love.

To fly out of the hood, in falconry, to unhood and slip when the quarry is in sight.

Falcons or long-winged hawks are either flown out of the hood, . . . or they are made to wait on till game is flushed.
Eugene Bed., IX. 9.

To fly the kite, to obtain money on notes or accommodation bills, in allusion to keeping such paper flying about as children do a kite. [Common slang.] To fly the red flag, to spout blood, as a whale.

fly¹ (flī), n.; pl. flies (fliz). [In def. 1, < ME. flye, < AS. flyga, flight, < flōagan (pp. flygen), fly; in other senses from the modern verb: see *fly*¹, v.] 1. The act of flying, or passing through the air; flight. [Obsolete or rare.]

The Eagle is fliest fowle in flye,
Ouer all fowles to waxe lvs weige.
Holly Rood (ed. Morris), p. 221.

'Twas an easy fly; the chariot [a car borne by owls] soon descended upon the crest of a hill.
Disraeli, Imperial Marriage, iii. 3.

2. A state of flying; in the phrase on the fly (which see, below).—3. Something having a rapid or flying motion, or some relation to such motion. (a) In mech. (1) An arrangement of vanes on a revolving axis to regulate the motion of clockwork by the impact of the vanes against the air; a faner; now chiefly used in musical boxes and the striking parts of clock-machinery. (2) Some contrivance for regulating the motion of machinery, as a fly-wheel, or cross-arm loaded at the ends with heavy weights, and placed at right angles to the axis of a windlass, jack, or the like. See fly-wheel. Also called fly-governor. (b) In printing, a contrivance for receiving and delivering separately printed sheets as they are printed on a press. The common form is an open framework of rods of wood, swinging in a quarter-circle on a rocking shaft, at the tail of a printing-press. Also called flyer. (c) In weaving, a shuttle with wheels driven through the shed by a blow or jerk. (d) In knitting-machines, a piece for holding the needle in position while passing through a new loop. Also called a letch. (e) In a spinning-frame, one of the arms that revolve round the bobbin and twist the yarn as it is wound upon it. See flyer, 4 (b). (f) That part of a vane which points and shows which way the wind blows. (g) In base-ball and cricket, a ball knocked or thrown high in the air. (h) (1) The extent of an ensign, flag, or pendant from the staff to the waving end, or, in a banner hanging from a cross yard, the length vertically from the yard downward. (2) The outer or loose-flying end in general, as distinguished from the part near the mast or yard.

The part of a flag furthest from the point of suspension is called the fly. Eugene Bed., IX. 27.

4. pl. In a theater, the large space above the proscenium, extending over the whole of the stage, and including the borders, border-lights, many ropes, cleats, and pulleys, the beams to which these are attached, and the fly-galleries on either side from which the borders and drop-scenes are handled.—5. A piece of canvas drawn over the ridge-pole of a tent, doubling the thickness of the roof, but not in contact with it except at the ridge-pole.—6. The flap or door of a tent.

Two or three Indians approached, peered through the fly, and then came in. The Century, XXX. 195

7. A strip of material sewed to a garment, but differing from a flounce in being drawn straight without gathering, and usually serving some purpose other than mere ornament. Thus, in some coats the buttonholes are incased in a fly, so that the buttons do not show when the coat is buttoned, sometimes the fly is sewed on beneath the buttonholes.

8. In cotton-spinning, waste cotton.—9. The hinged board which covers the keys of a piano or an organ when not in use. Fly of the mariners' compass, the compass card.—On the fly, during flight, while still in the air; before reaching the ground: as, to shoot a bird on the fly, to catch a ball on the fly.

fly² (flī), n.; pl. flies (fliz), except in sense 6, flies (fliz). [Early mod. E. also flu, flye: < ME. flye, flu, fler, flē, fley, flei, flou, floupe, etc., < AS. flōga, a fly (1. mūsen) = D. chog = MLG. chog, chog, LG. fluga = OHG. flōga, MHG. fluga, G. fluga, also (with unlaunt) OHG. flōga, MHG. flūga, G. flūga = (with short vowel) Teut. fluga = Sw. fluga = Dan. flue, a fly: < flōgan, E. *fly*¹: see *fly*¹, v.]

1. In popular language, a flying insect of any common kind.

Thou wilt be layed for a flye that one [on] thy flesche lyghtes!
Monte Athure (E. E. 1. 8.), l. 2441.

There came a grievous swarm of flies into the house of Pharaoh . . . and into all the land of Egypt. Ex. viii. 24.
 2. In entom., a two-winged insect; any one of the order Diptera, and especially of the family Muscidae; commonly used with a qualifying or specific term; as, the house-fly, Musca domestica. See the compounded words.

As flies to wanton boys are we to the gods;
 They kill us for their sport. Shak., Lear, iv. 1.

3. A fish-hook dressed with silk, tinsel, feathers, or other material, so as to resemble a fly or other insect, and used by anglers to entice fish.

Is it not an art to deceive a Trout with an artificial Fly?
I. Walton, Complete Angler, p. 36.

Not is it yet settled that by imitating the natural insect you can any advantage; one-half the most skillful fishermen assert that the fly . . . need resemble nothing on earth or in the waters under the earth.

R. L. Roosevelt, Game Fish, p. 265.

4. A familiar spirit; apparently a cant term with those who pretended to deal in magic and similar impostures.

Brought me th' intelligence in a paper here, . . .
 I have my flies abroad.

B. Jonson, Alchemist, iii. 2.

Even the shape of a fly was a favourite one with evil spirits, so much so, that the term fly was a popular synonym for a familiar.

Thistleton Dyer, Folk-Lore, p. 54.

5. Figuratively, an insignificant thing; a thing of no value.

The ground and foundation of faith without which had ready before, all the spiritual comfort that any man may speak of, can never anale a flye.

Sir T. More, Comfort against Tribulation (1573), fol. 7.

6. Pl. fly (fliz). [Usually referred directly to the verb fly, and defined as "a light carriage formed for rapid motion"; but this is not borne out by the first use of the name (see first extract). The name seems to have been a fanciful application of fly, an insect.] A kind of quick-running carriage; a light vehicle for passengers; a hackney-coach.

A nouvelle kind of four-wheeled vehicles drawn by a man and an assistant; . . . they are denominated flys, a name first given by a gentleman at the Pavilion (at Brighton, England) upon their first introduction in 1816.

Wright's Brighton Amulet, 1818. (Davies.)

When the poor, old, broken-down fly drove up, and the portmanteaus were taken down, . . . the two timid young people stepped out of the mouldy old carriage.

Mrs. Oliphant, Poor Gentleman, xviii.

Berna fly, a species of Trypeta (which see).—Black fly, any one of the species of the genus Simulium, some of which are extraordinarily abundant in the northern woods of America, and cause great suffering by their bites.

Camel-necked flies. See camel-necked. East India fly, a species of vesivatory fly, much larger than the common cantharis.

Golden-eyed fly, any tabanid of the genus Chrysops (which see). Green-headed fly, Tabanus lineator.

Hessian fly, a destructive insect, Cecidomyia destructor, supposed to have been introduced during the revolutionary war by the Hessian troops, and now the most serious enemy of wheat in America. This fly is a small dusky midge, and its larva is a yellowish or reddish mag-

got. There are two broods annually, the first laying eggs in April or May, the second in September. The remedies are late sowing, or, on some times sowing a small patch early to give as a trap, pasturing with sheep in November, and sowing hardy varieties, such as the Fendishill Mediterranean, which is especially the Lanesford variety.

Onion-fly, Delia autumnalis, the larva of which is known as the onion maggot. See Anthomyia. Orange-belted fly, Taeniorhynchus.

Snelled fly, in antiflog, a fly fitted on a shell. Spanish fly, the blistering fly. See Cantharis.

Tail fly, a wingless fly at the end of the leader. See To cast the fly. See cast.

To rise to the fly, to be attracted by an artificial fly when it is offered to him, and of some fishes, in contradistinction to being taken unexpectantly.

To tie a fly, to dress a bait with a fly or similar fly. White fly, (a) The pest of the cotton plant, Aphis gossypii, a small fly May.

(b) A pest of the apple tree, Aphis pomorum, a small fly May.

(c) A pest of the hop, Aphis lupuli, a small fly May.

fly¹ (flī), n. [fly, v.] 1. trans. To convey in a fly.

Tuesday, Poole fled us all the way to Sir T. Ackland's Somersetshire seat.

Southey, Letters, III. 478.

II. intrans. To travel by a fly. Davies.

We then fled to Stogursey just to see the Church.

Southey, Letters, III. 478.

fly³ (flī), a. [Early mod. E. also flee; another form of fledge, flidge, flish, flush, etc., through dial. fly, < ME. fligge, flygge, able to fly, fledged (hence able to shift for oneself, knowing); ult. < fly, v.: see fledge and flush.] Knowing; wide-awake; quick to take one's meaning or intention; as, a fly young man. [Slang.]

"Do what I want, and I will pay you well." . . . "I am fly," says Jo.

Dickens, Bleak House, xvi.

"I want to tell you that—" . . . "Shut up!" replied the police official, "you are too fly. I've had hundreds of cuses like yours."

Philadelphia Times, Aug. 15, 1883.

fly⁴ (flī), n. See fly.

fly-agaric (flī'a-gar'ik), n. A species of mushroom, Agaricus muscarius, found in woods, and having a bright-red pileus studded with pale warts, while the stipe and gills are ivory-white. The juice is a strong narcotic, and poisonous if taken to excess. It is employed in some countries, mixed with the juice of cranberries, to produce intoxication, and an infusion of the plant is largely employed as a poison for flies, whence the name. Also called flybane.

flyaway (flī'a-wā'), a. [fly away, phr.] Flighty; restless; fluttering; as, a flyaway young woman; a flyaway costume. [Colloq.]

flyaway-grass (flī'a-wā-grās), n. The Agrostis scabra, a common grass of North America, with a very loose, light panicle, which breaks off at maturity, and is driven to great distances before the wind. Also called hair-grass.

fly-bait (flī'bāt), n. A natural fly used as bait, or an artificial fly serving as a lure.

flybane (flī'hān), n. Same as fly-agaric.

fly-bitten (flī'bit'n), a. Marked by the bites of insects.

fly-blister (flī'blis'tēr), n. A plaster made of cantharides.

fly-block (flī'blok), n. Naut. See block.

flyblow (flī'blō), v. pp. flyblown, ppr. flyblowing. [fly, v., + blow]; first in the p. a. flyblown.] 1. trans. 1. To make flyblown; taint with or as if with flyblows: chiefly in figurative uses.

Can claw his subtle elbow, or with a buzz Flyblow his ears. B. Jonson, Sejanus, v. 10.

I am unwilling to believe that he designs to play tricks, and to flyblow my words, to make others distrust them.

Stillingfleet.

II. intrans. To deposit eggs on meat or the like, as a fly.

So morning insects, that in muck begun,
 Shine, buzz, and flyblow in the setting sun.

Pope, Moral Essays, ii. 27.

flyblow (flī'blō), n. [flyblow, v.] The egg of a fly, the presence of which in numbers on meat, etc., makes it tainted and maggoty.

flyblown (flī'blōn), p. a. [fly, v., + blown], pp. of blow. Hence flyblow.] Tainted with flyblows; hence, spoiled; impure.

Him, that thou magnifiest with all these titles,
 Stinking and fly-blown, lies here at our feet.

Shak., 1 Hen. VI., iv. 7.

Such a light as putrefaction breeds
 In fly-blown flesh, whereon the maggot feeds.

Cooper, Conversation, l. 676.

fly-board (flī'bōrd), n. In printing, the board on which the printed sheets are laid by the fly.

flyboat (flī'bōt), n. [Early mod. E. also flyboat, flyboat; cf. F. flyboat = Sp. flyboat, flyboat, G. flyboat, < D. flyboat, flyboat. The E. term, like the others, is usually derived from the D., but the D. term does not appear in Kilian (1598), and the formation, which should rather be flyboat*, is unusual; the D. may be from the E. The E. word, appar. referring to the swiftness of the boat, < fly, v., + boat, may be an acronym, of fly, a kind of swift ship (only in poetry, but the comp. fly-skip, 'fly-skip,' opposed to longship, 'long ship,' also in prose; a form flyboat* = flyboat does not occur). For the supposed connection with fly-buster, see that word.] 1. A large flat-bottomed Dutch vessel with a high stem, of a kind chiefly employed in the coasting-trade, having a burden of from 400 to 600 tons.

One of the Flemings flyboats, . . . chanced . . . to be fired and blown up by his own powder.

Hakluyt's Voyages, l. 642.

2. A light, swift sail-boat.

Here's such a company of flyboats, bailing about this gall-asse of greatness, that there's no boarding him.

Marston, Antonio and Melinda, l. v. 1.

3. A long, narrow, flat-bottomed boat used for the transportation in canals and rivers of goods requiring to be carefully packed and kept dry. Also called swift-boat. [Great Britain.]

fly-book (flī'būk), n. A case in the form of a book in which to keep fishing-flies. It has leaves of Bristol-board or other stiff material. At the ends of the leaf are small hooks or loops to which the fish-hooks are attached so that the flies may be carried without bending the gut.

Fly-book.

fly-boy (flī'boi), n. In printing, a boy who seizes printed sheets as they come from the press, and lays them in order.

fly-brush (flī'brūsh), n. A long-handled brush used for driving away flies. It is often made of peacocks' feathers.

They both had fallen asleep side by side on the grass, and the abandoned fly-brush lay full across his face.

The Century, XXXV. 946.

fly-bug (flī'bug), n. A winged bug or heteropterous insect, Reduvius personatus, of the family Reduviidae, which preys upon the bedbug.

fly-cap (flī'kap), n. A cap or head-dress formerly worn by elderly women, formed like two crescents conjoined, and, by means of wire, made to stand out from the cushion on which the hair was dressed. Its name seems to come from the resemblance of its sides to wings.

fly-case (flī'kās), n. The case or covering of an insect; specifically, the anterior wings of a beetle, so hardened as to cover the whole upper part of the body, concealing the second pair of wings; the elytra. See out under Coloptera.

fly-caster (flī'kās'tēr), n. An angler who casts flies, or uses a fly-rod; a fly-fisher.

fly-casting (flī'kās'ting), n. and a. 1. n. The act or art of casting the fly in angling.

II. a. Casting the fly, as in angling; pertaining to fly-fishing in general; as, a fly-casting tournament.

flycatcher (flī'kach'ēr), n. 1. One who or that which catches or entraps flies or other winged insects.—2. Specifically, a bird which habitually pursues and captures insects on the wing.

(a) Any species of the old world family Muscicapidae, a large group of oscine passerine birds having a flattened bill garnished with rictal bristles. The species and genera are very numerous, and the limits of the family are not fixed. Among the best known species are the spotted flycatcher, Muscicapula grisola, and the pied flycatcher, M. atricapilla.

(b) Any species of the American family Tyrannidae, a group of non-oscine passerine birds peculiar to America; a tyrant or tyrant flycatcher, of which there are many genera and several hundred species. See, for example, Contopus, Empidonax.

(c) Some bird of muscivorous or tyrannine affinities or of fly-catching habits, like or likened to either of the foregoing, as, for example, a fly-catching warbler of the family Mniotiltidae. The word was originally used with great latitude.—Derbian flycatcher. See Derbian.

Fork-tailed flycatcher. See Fork-tailed.

fly-catching (flī'kach'ing), a. Catching flies; habitually pursuing flies upon the wing; having the characters of a flycatcher.

fly-clip (flī'klip), n. One of the leaves of a fly-book. See fly-book.

fly-dressing (flī'dres'ing), n. The act or art of manufacturing artificial flies and of mounting them on hooks for use in angling.

fly-drill (flī'dril), n. A drill to which a steady momentum is imparted by means of a fly-wheel having a reciprocating motion like that of the balance-wheel of a watch.

Pied Flycatcher (Muscicapula atricapilla).

Fly-drill.

fly-dung (flī'dung), v. t. In dyeing, to pass through a bath of strong cow-dung, or, as is now usual, of a solution of silicate of soda, of the double phosphate of soda and lime, or of arsenite or arseniate of soda, in order to get rid of the flies or spots due to irregular dyeing; said of goods dyed with madder.

fly-dunging (flī'dung'ing), n. In dyeing, the first of the two passages of a fabric through the dunging solution, the second passage being known as the second dunging. See fly-dung.

The dunging process is always performed twice: the first time in a cistern with rollers, and the second, in a beck similar to a dye-beck, washing well between. The first is called fly-dunging; the other, second dunging. See fly-dung. Ure, Dict., I, 627.

flyer, n. See flier.

fly-finisher (flī'fin'ish-ēr), n. In pianoforte-making, one who fits up and places in position the movable parts of a piano.

fly-fishing (flī'fin'ish-ing), n. In pianoforte-making, the act of fitting and placing in position the movable parts of a piano.

fly-fish (flī'fish), n. A scorpenoid fish, Sebastes rhodochloris, with moderate scales, smooth cranial ridges, and pale blotches on the sides, surrounded by green shades. It is about a foot long, and is found in deep water off the coast of California.

fly-fisher (flī'fish-ēr), n. One who angles with flies as lures.

A sly allusion to the colossal catches reported by imaginative fly-fishers. The Critic, April 3, 1886.

fly-fishing (flī'fish'ing), n. The art or practice of angling for fish with a rod and natural or artificial flies as lures.

Fly-fishing, or fishing at the top, is, as I said before, of two sorts, with a natural and living fly, or with an artificial and made fly. Cotton, in Walton's Angler, ii, 241.

fly-flap (flī'flap), n. 1. Something with which to drive away flies; a fly-flapper.

A fly-flap, wherewith to chase them away from blowing of meate, flabellum. Withals, Dict. (ed. 1608), p. 207.

2. A kind of somersault. See the extract.

There was also the feat of turning round with great rapidity, alternately bearing upon the hands and feet, denominated the fly-flap.

Strutt, Sports and Pastimes, p. 317.

fly-flapper (flī'flap'ēr), n. 1. One who drives away flies by means of a fly-flap.—2. A fly-flap.—3. One who turns fly-flaps.

fly-frame (flī'frām), n. 1. In printing, the longer rods on three sides of the fly of a printing-press, which give the smaller rods proper strength and stiffness.—2. In plate-glass manuf., a machine for grinding smooth any roughnesses upon the surface of the plates. It consists of two beds of stone or cast-iron placed a short distance apart, with a pivoted frame with two arms secured between them, and oscillating on its pivot. The arms carry heavy rubbing-plates, each being secured to its arm by a pin traveling in a slot in the arm. When the machine is set in motion, sand and water are applied between the rubbing-plates and the plates of glass, which are secured upon the beds by plaster of Paris, and a vigorous grinding action is induced upon the surface of the glass. — Bobbin and fly-frame. See bobbin.

fly-fringe (flī'frinj), n. A trimming for women's dresses worn toward the close of the eighteenth century. It was made of floss-silk, the spreading and projecting tassels of which were supposed to resemble flies.

fly-gallery (flī'gal'e-ri), n. One of several galleries on either side of the flies of a theater, varying in number according to the size of the house. The drop-scenes and borders are worked from the fly-galleries.

The "fly-men" who work the drops and borders are at the ropes in the first fly-gallery. Scribner's Mag., IV, 444.

fly-governor (flī'guv-ēr-nōr), n. Same as fly, 3 (a).

fly-honeysuckle (flī'hun'i-suk-l), n. In bot.: (a) A plant, Lonicera xylosteum. (b) A name given to a species of Halleria.

fly-hook (flī'hūk), n. A fish-hook to which is attached an artificial fly as a lure.

flying (flī'ing), n. [ME. flyinge, flyghyng, etc.; verbal n. of fly, v.] 1. The act of moving through the air on wings; flight.

Some [fowls] are of ill flythynne for henyenes of body and for thaire neste es nighte fere fra the erthe.

Hampole, Prose Treatises (E. E. T. S.), p. 8.

2. pl. Loose or floating waste of any kind.

It [the dynamo-machine] should not be exposed to dust or flyings. Greer, Dict. of Elect., p. 87.

flying (flī'ing), p. a. Swift; equipped for swift motion; as, a flying party.—Flying army, a strong body of cavalry and infantry, which is always in motion to cover its own garrisons or to keep the enemy in continual alarm. Farrow.—Flying artillery, camp, column, etc. See the nouns.

flying-cat (flī'ing-kat), n. 1. Same as flying-lemur.—2. The taguan or flying-squirrel, a species of the rodent genus Pteromys. [Rare.] flying-dragon (flī'ing-drag-on), n. See dragon, 2.

flying-feather (flī'ing-fe-thēr), n. Same as flight-feather (which see, under feather).

flying-fish (flī'ing-fish), n. Any fish which can sustain itself or make a flight through the air by means of enlarged and wing-like pectoral fins. Specifically (a) A syngnathous fish of the family Exocoetidae and subfamily Exocoetinae, especially of the genus Exocoetia. (See these words.) Nine species of this genus, and of the related genera Holocypselus and Paracopterus, have been taken off the Atlantic coast of North America. There is also a large Californian species, E. californensis, some 16 or 17 inches long, which has been observed to take very long flights. See the extract.

California Flying-fish (Exocoetia californensis).

The flying-fishes proper, forming the subfamily of Exocoetinae, are distinguished [from other exocoetids] by the development of the pectorals, which are elongated and capable of considerable horizontal extension, so that the fish is buoyed up in the air, which it reaches by vigorous movements of its stout tail and caudal fin. . . . The species of the family are pelagic, and representatives are found in almost all the tropical and warm seas. They associate together in schools of considerable size. The aerial flight is not strictly entitled to the name, for the pectoral fins are not used in active progression, but are simply employed as parachutes. . . . The fins are . . . more or less vibrated, but it is rather by an opposition to the air than by the volition of the animal. Staud. Nat. Hist., III, 175.

(b) The flying-gurnard, flying-robin, or bat fish, an acanthopterygian fish of the genus Cephaloscyllium or Dactylopterus, having enlarged pectoral fins divided into two parts, and also able to take short flights in the air. They are pelagic like the others, and go in schools in warm seas, though the best-known species, C. or D. volitans, reaches a high latitude. Some are from 12 to 18 inches in length, and in general they resemble the gurnards (Triglidae), but differ in many anatomical details. See cut under Dactylopterus.

flying-fox (flī'ing-foks), n. A large frugivorous bat; any bat of the family Pteropodidae, and especially of the genus Pteropus, as the well-known P. rubricollis: so called from the fox-like shape of the head. There are many species, constituting collectively one of the prime divisions of the order Chiroptera.

Flying-fox (Pteropus medius).

The terns are all gone, but in their place the flying-foxes flap heavily along the water.

P. Robinson, Under the Sun, p. 88.

flying-frog (flī'ing-frog), n. A batrachian of Borneo, of the genus Rhacophorus and family Flying-frog (Rhacophorus marmoratus).

Ranidae, having enormously long webbed toes, enabling it to sustain a kind of flight.

flying-gecko (flī'ing-gek'ō), n. A kind of gecko-lizard, Phyllorhina homaloptera, which has large wing-like expansions of skin on the head, trunk, tail, and limbs, acting as a parachute to sustain the animal during flying leaps.

flying-gurnard (flī'ing-gör'närd), n. A flying-fish of the family Cephaloscyllidae or Dactylopteroideae. Also called flying-robin. See flying-fish (b), and cut under Dactylopterus.

flying-hook (flī'ing-hūk), n. The upper or third hook on the line used by fishermen in catching whiting and other small fish. [South Carolina, 17, 8.]

flying-lemur (flī'ing-lē'mēr), n. A mammal of the order Insectivora and family Galeopithecidae, provided with an extension of the skin like a parachute, by means of which it makes flying leaps from tree to tree. Its resemblance to a lemur is such that it was formerly referred to the order Primates. It has, however, no special affinities with the lemurs. Galeopithecus volans is a common species of Borneo, Sumatra, Malacca, etc. Also called glumcut. See cut under Galeopithecus.

flying-lizard (flī'ing-liz'ärd), n. Any lizard of the genus Draco, as D. volans.

flying-machine (flī'ing-mä-shēn'), n. 1. A contrivance designed to enable its user to fly. Various machines of this nature have been constructed at different times, but none has yet been invented which can be practically useful.

2. A machine designed to float in and propel itself through the air.

flying-marmot (flī'ing-mär'mōt), n. A taguan or large flying-squirrel of the genus Pteromys. Gmelin.

flying-phalanger (flī'ing-fa-lan-jēr), n. A general popular name of the petaturists or flying marsupial animals of the family Phalangeridae, having a parachute-like fold of skin along the sides by which they are enabled to take flying leaps through the air. There are several species and genera, differing much in size and general appearance, some being no larger than a mouse. Also called acrobat and glumcut. See cut under Acrobates.

flying-robin (flī'ing-rob-in), n. The flying-gurnard.

flying-shot (flī'ing-shōt), n. 1. A shot fired at an object in motion, as a horseman, or a ship under sail, etc.—2. A marksman who fires at an object in motion. Farrow.

flying-squid (flī'ing-skwid), n. A sagittated cutanary or sea-arrow; a cephalopod or squid of the genus Ommastrephes; so called from having two large lateral fins, which enable it to leap so high out of water that it sometimes falls on the deck of a ship.

flying-squirrel (flī'ing-skwr-ēl), n. A squirrel or squirrel-like animal having a fold of skin like a parachute along each side of the body, by means of which it is enabled to make long flying leaps through the air. Specifically (a) A squirrel proper, a rodent mammal of the family Sciuridae, of the above character. The smaller species, of which several inhabit North America and Europe, belong to the genus Sciuropterus. Such are S. columella, the common flying-squirrel of North America, 6 or 7 inches long without the tail, with large black eyes and extremely soft fur, and the similar old-world S. volans. The taguans or larger flying squirrels are all of the old world, and belong to the genus Pteromys; they are sometimes called flying-marmots and glumcuts. See cut under Pteromys. (b) Same as phalanger.

flying-torch (flī'ing-tōrch), n. Milit., a torch attached to a long staff for use in night signaling. Farrow.

flying-watchman (flī'ing-woch-man), n. The dor-beetle or dumble-dor, Geotrupes stercorarius. [Local, Eng.] fly-leaf (flī'lēf), n. A blank leaf at the beginning or end of a book; the blank leaf of a folded circular program, or the like.

fly-line (flī'lin), n. [fly + line, 2.] The route habitually taken by a bird in its regular migration.

One of the fly-lines of this species [the American bittern] crosses the Bermuda islands.

H. Seebach, British Birds, II. 506.

fly-line² (flī'lin), n. [< fly + *line*².] A line used for angling with an artificial fly. It is usually a long line of silk or linen terminating in a length of silkworm gut, called a leader, at the extremity of which is the tail-fly. Other flies, called droppers, are attached to the leader by snells or snoods.

Thirty yards of waterproofed and polished fly-line of braided silk fly-maker (flī'mā kēr), n. One who ties artificial flies for angling.

A certain school of fly-makers tie on the wings, or more properly the wing, last of all. T. Norris, Art of Fly-making.

flyman¹ (flī'man), n.; pl. flymen (-men). [< fly, n., 4. + man.] One who works the ropes in the flies of a theater.

The fly-men shove off the side-scenes, the fly-men raise the drops, the fly-clearers run off the properties and set-pieces, and the stage-carpenters lower the bridges.
Scribner's Mag., IV. 445.

flyman² (flī'man), n.; pl. flymen (-men). [*< fly*², n., 6. + man.] One who drives a fly.

fly-mixture (flī'miks tūr), n. A preparation, as spirits of ammonia, oil, and tar, rubbed by anglers upon their faces and hands as a protection from flies, mosquitoes, etc.

fly-net (flī'net), n. [ME. not found; AS. flōh-net (= OD. flughen-net), < flōge, a fly, + net, a net.] 1. A net used as a protection against flies, as in an open window to prevent their entrance.—2. A fringe or a net used to protect a horse from flies.

fly-nut (flī'nūt), n. A nut having wings which are twisted by the hand, as the screw-nut of a hand-vise.

fly-oil (flī'oil), n. A fly-mixture in which oil is the chief ingredient.

fly-orchis (flī'or kis), n. The common name of Ophrys muscifera, from the resemblance of the flowers to flies.

fly-paper (flī'pā pēr), n. Poisoned paper used for killing flies, or a paper with an adhesive coating to which flies adhere.

fly-penning (flī'pen ing), n. A mode of manuring land by folding cattle or sheep in rotation over different parts of it.

fly-poison (flī'poi zn), n. 1. A poisonous substance used to kill flies.—2. In bot., the Ambrosium moscatoreum, a liliaceous plant of the eastern part of the United States, allied to Ferula. It has a single tall stem bearing a dense raceme of white flowers. The bulb, when pounded, has been used as a poison for flies.

fly-powder (flī'pon dēr), n. Any powder used to kill flies, usually an imperfect oxid of arsenic formed by the exposure of native arsenic to the air and mixed with sugar and water.

fly-press (flī'pres), n. A press for embossing, die-stamping, punching, and the like, furnished with a fly or dier. See flier, 4 (d).

fly-rail (flī'ral), n. A movable part of a table which supports the leaf.

flyre, v. and n. An obsolete or dialectal variant of *flier*¹.

fly-reed (flī'red), n. In wearing. See *reed*¹.

fly-rod (flī'rod), n. A rod used by anglers in fly-fishing. Fly rods are made generally in three pieces, the butt, second joint, and tip, and are very light and flexible. There are two or more rings on each joint, through which the line runs from the tip to the reel. The best rods have butts made of bamboo split lengthwise in strips, which are then glued and bound together, preserving as much as possible the hard outer or outer part, the softer inner substance being cut away. The second joint and tip are made of the best selected hawthorn. In size the best trout rods are from 10 to 11 feet long, and weigh from 8 to 10 ounces. The reel is placed behind the handle, near the end of the butt. Fly rods are also made of steel.

fysch (fisch), n. [Swiss.] In geol., the Swiss local name of a rock of importance in Alpine geology, introduced as a scientific designation by Stüder in 1827. It is a sandstone formation of great thickness, extending through the Alps along their northern slope from the southwestern extremity of Switzerland to Vienna, where it is also known as the "Vienna sandstone." The fossils which this formation contains are chiefly bryozoa, of little value for determining the geological age of the rock, which, however, is generally considered to be Eocene Tertiary, but the lower portion of the flysch in its eastern extension is referred to the Cretaceous.

fly-sheet (flī'shet), n. A loose sheet of paper forming a single leaf, as one on which a handball or broadside is printed.

He was once painted on a fly-sheet at Rottwell in the county of Northampton.
The American, VII. 154.

fly-shuttle (flī'shut l), n. A shuttle with wheels propelled by a cord and driver.

fly slow (flī' slō), v. [An old use of the phrase fly low—see del—] explainable, if genuine, as a Shalopian caprice. Moving slowly. [This reading occurs only in one of the folio editions of Shakespeare and some modern ones; the others have fly slow. The change probably arose from a printer's mistake of the old long s for f.]

The fly-slow hours shall not determinate
The dateless limit of thy dear exile.

Shak., Rich. II., i. 3.

flysnapper (flī'snap ēr), n. In ornith.: (a) A bird of the subfamily Mniagrina, and of the genus Mniagra, or Terpisiphone, etc. (b) A shining-black crested fly-catching bird, Phainopepla nitens, of the southwestern United States. It is about 7½ inches long, and has a large white area on each wing. It is commonly referred to the Mniagristina.

Flysnapper (Phainopepla nitens), male.

fly-speck (flī'spek), n. An excrementitious stain made by an insect, chiefly by the common house-fly.

fly-specked (flī'spekt), a. Specked or soiled with fly-dung.

The lawyers of the circuit took their seats at the breakfast-table in the meagerly furnished, fly-specked dining-room of the tavern.
E. Eggleston, The Graysons, xxv.

fly-tackle (flī'takl), n. The implements used in fly-fishing, including rod, line, flies, etc.

flytail (flī'tāl), n. A small gill-net without sinkers, formerly used for catching perch and other small fish. [North Carolina, U. S.]

fly-taker (flī'tāk'ēr), n. In angling, any fish that will take the fly.

flyte, v. and n. See flite.

fly-tent (flī'tent), n. A tent protected from rain or heat by an additional covering of canvas stretched from the ridge-pole and forming a separate roof. See *fly*¹, n., 5.

He [Gen. Sherman] sleeps in a fly-tent, like the rest of us.
G. W. Nichols, The Great March, p. 130.

fly-tier (flī'tī'ēr), n. One who ties fishing-flies on hooks; a fly-dresser; a maker of artificial flies for anglers.

fly-tip (flī'tip), n. The extreme end, joint, or tip of a fly-rod; the tip, as distinguished from the second joint and the butt.

fly-trap (flī'trap), n. 1. A trap to catch flies.—2. In bot., the Apocynum androsaemifolium, which captures insects by means of its irritable throat-appendages. Venus's fly-trap, the Dionaea muscipula. See Dionaea.

fly-up-the-creek (flī'up-the-krēk'), n. 1. A common name of the small green heron of the United States, Butorides virescens, also called shitepoke, chalk-line, and little green heron.—2. A giddy, capricious person. [Colloq., U. S.]

fly-water (flī'wā'tēr), n. A solution of arsenic, decoction of quassia-bark, or the like, used for killing flies.

fly-weevil (flī'wē'vīl), n. The common grain-moth, Gracchia cerealella. [Southern U. S.]

fly-wheel (flī'hwel), n. In mach., a wheel with a heavy rim placed on the revolving shaft of any machinery put in motion by an irregular or intermittent force or meeting with an irregular or intermittent resistance, for the purpose of rendering the motion equable and regular by means of its momentum.

F. M. An abbreviation of field-marshal.

fnesel, v. [ME., < AS. fneasan = Icel. fneasa, later fneja = Dan. fneja = Sw. fneja, snort. Cf. fneze.] To breathe heavily; snort; snore. He speaketh in his nose.

And fneaseth faste

Chaucer, Plol. to Maniple's Tale, l. 62.

foht, n. An obsolete spelling of for.

Fo² (fo), n. [Chinese.] 1. Same as Foh².—2. In Chinese decorative art, a dog-like animal represented in carvings, porcelains, etc., considered as the guardian of the Buddhist temples, and called by this name in Europe and America when occurring in Oriental art and decoration. Also called the Dog Fo and the Dog of Fo.

F. O. An abbreviation of field-officer.

foal (fōl), n. [< ME. fole, foile, < AS. fola, m., = OFries. folia, NFries. fole = MD. rolen, D. ven- len = MLG. rolen = OHG. folo, MHG. rol, vole, G. fohlen = Icel. foli = Sw. fale = Dan. fole = Goth. fula, a foal (see other Teut. forms under the deriv. jilly); = L. pullus, the young of an animal, a foal, but particularly of fowls, a chicken (whence ult. E. pullen, pool², poult, poultry, pullet, q. v.), = Gr. πῶλος, a young animal, particularly a foal or filly; cf. Skt. pota, the young of an animal, putra, a son.] 1. The young of the equine genus of quadrupeds, of either sex; a colt or a filly.

Home geds to stable:

Thar he tok his gode fole

Also blak so eny cole.

King Horn (E. E. T. S.), l. 589.

Behold, thy King cometh unto thee: he is just, and having salvation; lowly, and riding upon an ass, and upon a colt the foal of an ass.
Zech. ix. 9.

With that his strong dog, of no dastard kinde (Swift as the foales conceived by the winde),
He set upon the wolfe.

W. Browne, Britannia's Pastorals, li. § 4.

2. In coal-mining. See the extract. [Eng.]

When they [boys] reach the age of ten or twelve years, a more laborious station is allotted to them. They then become what are termed lads or foals; supplying the inferior place at a machine called a tram.
A. Hunter, Geographical Essays, II. 158.

foal (fōl), v. [< foal, n.] I. trans. To bring forth, as a colt or filly; said of a mare or a she-ass.

In the fourth year of the reign of George III., the year of the great eclipse, the celebrated "Eclipse" was foaled.
S. Dowell, Taxes in England, III. 263.

II. intrans. To bring forth young, as an animal of the horse kind.

Then he again, by way of irrision, "yee say very true indeed, that will ye, quoth hee, when a mule shall bring fourth a fole." Afterwards when this Galba began to rebel and aspire unto the empire, no thing hardened him in this designe of his so much, as the foaling of a mule.
Holland, tr. of Suetonius, p. 212.

foalfoot (fōl'fūt), n. A name of the coltsfoot, Tussilago Farfara, and of some other plants, as the asarabacca, Asarum Europæum: so called from the shape of their leaves. See cut under Asarum.

foal-teeth (fōl'tēth), n. pl. The first teeth of horses, which they shed at a certain age.

foam (fōm), n. [Early mod. E. also fome; < ME. fōme, fōm, < AS. fām = LG. fām = OHG. feim, MHG. reim, G. feim, dial. faum, foam. The supposed connection with L. spuma, foam, is doubtful; see spume.] 1. An aggregation of bubbles formed on the surface of water or other liquid by violent agitation or by fermentation; froth; spume; as, the foam of breaking waves; the foam of the mouth.

She whipped her steed, she spurred her steed,

Till his breast was all a foam.
Sir Roland (Child's Ballads, l. 225).

Look how two boars
Together side by side, their threatening tusks do whet,
And with their gnashing teeth their angry foam do bite,
Whilst still they should ring seek each other where to snite.
Drayton, Polyolbion, xli. 325.

It is the frequency of the reflections at the limiting surfaces of air and water that renders foam opaque.
Tyndall, Light and Elect., p. 40.

2†. The foaming sea; a foaming wave.

flor to fare on the foam into fer londes.

Destiny of Troy (E. E. T. S.), l. 985.

Aye the wynde was in the sayle

Over fomes they flett withouthyn fayle

The weith then forth gan swepe

Le Bone Florence (Ritson's Metr. Rom., III.).

3. Figuratively, foaming rage; fury.

Our churches, in the foam of that good spirit which directed such fiery tongues, they term spitefully the temples of Baal, idle synagogues, abominable styles.

Hooker, Eccles. Polity, v. 11.

4. In mineral., same as aphrite.—5†. Seum, as from molten metal.

Foam that cometh of lead tried, being in colour like gold.

Nomenclator.

foam (fōm), v. [Early mod. E. also fome; < ME. fōm; fōm (in older uninflected form) femen, < AS. fōman = OHG. feiman*, feiman, foam; from the noun. I. intrans. 1. To form or gather foam, as water (the crest of a wave), etc., from agitation, a liquor from fermentation, or the mouth from rage or disease; froth; spume.

The frothe fowed at his mouth unfayre bi the wykez, Whettez his wyhte tuschez.

Sir Gawaine and the Green Knight (E. E. T. S.), l. 1572.

To conclude, the very foaming channel of the river, stained and died with the barbarians blood, was even amazed to see such strange and unclean sights.

Holland, tr. of Ammannus, p. 76.

He foameth and gusheth with his teeth. Mark ix. 18.

That Psyche, wont to bind my throbbing brow,
To smooth my pillow, mix the foaming draught
Of fever. Tennyson, Princess, li.

2. To become filled or covered with foam, as a steam-boiler when the water is frothy.

Dert dynties that delt the doughty betwene,
With thaire fawchons fell, foam'd of blode.
Destruction of Troy (E. E. T. S.), l. 10219.

II. trans. 1. To cause to foam; fill with something that foams; make frothy: as, to foam a tankard. [Rare.]—2. To throw out with rage or violence: usually with out. [Rare.]

Raging waves of the sea, foaming out their own shame.
Jude 13.

Slowly . . . went Leolin; then . . .
Down thro' the bright lawns to his brother's ran,
And foam'd away his heart at Averil's ear.
Tennyson, Aylmer's Field.

foam-bow (fōm'bō), n. The iris formed by sunlight upon foam or spray, as of a cataract.

His cheek brighten'd as the foam-bow brightens
When the wind blows the foam. Tennyson, Enone.

foam-cock (fōm'kok), n. In steam-boilers, a cock at the water-level by which steam is drawn off.

foam-collector (fōm'kō-lek'tor), n. A vessel placed at the water-level in a steam-boiler to collect and discharge the foam or scum.

foamingly (fō'ming-li), adv. With foam; frothily.

foamless (fōm'les), a. [< foam + -less.] Free from foam.

He who would question him
Must sail alone at sunset where the stream
Of ocean sleeps around those foamless isles.
Shelley, Hellas.

foam-spar (fōm'spär), n. Same as aphrite.

foam-wreath (fōm'rēth), n. The foam that crowns or edges a breaker, or that lies on a pool.
The long wash of waves, with red and green Tangles of weltering weed through the white foam-wreaths seen. Whittier, Tent on the Beach.

foamy (fō'mi), a. [Early mod. E. also fomy, < ME. fomy, < AS. fāmig, fāmig, foamy, < fām, foam: see foam.] Covered with or consisting of foam; frothy; of a foam-like character.

That most ingrateful boy there, by your side,
From the rude sea's enrag'd and foamy mouth
Did I redeem. Shak., T. N., v. 1.

As the peace-making tide gradually drifted their boats asunder, their [the boatmen's] anger rose, and they danced back and forth and hurled opprobrium with a foamy volu-bility that quite left my powers of comprehension behind.
Hovells, Venetian Life, viii.

fob¹ (fob), v. t.; pret. and pp. fobbed, ppr. fob-bing. [In another form fub, q. v.;] the same, with change of the final consonant, as fop¹,
q. v. 1. To cheat; trick; impose upon.

You've borne me in hand this three months, and now fob'd me. Middleton (and others), The Widow, ii. 1.

His Excellence had each Man fob'd,
For he had sunk their Pay.
Prior, The Viceroy, st. 27.

2. To beat; maltreat. Beau, and Fl.—To fob off.
(a) To put off slightly or deceitfully; get rid of by a trick; wave aside. See to put off, under off.
You must not think to fob off your disgrace with a tale.
Shak., Cor., i. 1.

The rascal fobbed me off with only wine. Addison.
The local interest of the English in the Britons has led their scholars to complain that Mommsen ("Roman Empire," V. 4) has fobbed off Britain with too brief a notice.
Amer. Jour. Philol., VI. 453.

(b) To pass off by a false representation; dispose of by deception; as, to fob off a worthless article on a customer.

fob¹ (fob), n. [< ME. fobbe; < fob¹, v.] 1. A tap on the shoulder, as from a bailiff.

The man, sir, that, when gentlemen are tired, gives them a fob, and 'rests them. Shak., C. of E., iv. 3.

2. A cheat.
To lede alle these othere,
As fobbes and faitours that on hure fet rennen.
Piers Plouman (C), iii. 193.

fob² (fob), n. [Cf. G. dial. (Prussian) fuppe, a pocket (Brem. Diet.); Skinner also quotes G. fupsack.] 1. A little pocket made in the waist-band of men's breeches or trousers as a receptacle for a watch.

He who had so lately sack'd
The enemy, had done the fact,
Had ritted all his pokes and fobs
Of gimcracks, whims, and jingum-bobs.
S. Butler, Hudibras, III. i. 107.

2. A watch-chain, or ribbon with buckle and seals or the like, such as is worn appended to the watch and hanging from the fob. [U. S.]

—, pointing menacingly at the tempting fob that hung from his pocket, repeated the demand.
McClutton-Kipley, From Flag to Flag, xxiv.

fob² (fob), v. t.; pret. and pp. fobbed, ppr. fob-bing. [< fob², n.] To put into a fob; pocket; get possession of.

Very pretty sums he has fobbed now and then, . . . 3000*l.*
in his saddle-bags at once.

W. Howitt, Visits to Remarkable Places, p. 170.

fob³ (fob), v. i.; pret. and pp. fobbed, ppr. fob-bing. [Origin obscure.] To breathe hard or with heaving sides; gasp from violent running.
[Scotch.]

The hails is won, they warse hame,
The best they can for fobbin.
Tarras, Poems, p. 66.

fob⁴ (fob), n. [E. dial., origin obscure; hardly an altered form of foam.] Froth or foam.
Halliwel, Prov. Eng.

F. O. B. An abbreviation of free on board, used in executing contracts of sale, and indicating that delivery on the vessel or other conveyance of a carrier is to be without expense to the buyer.

fob-chain (fob'chän), n. A watch-chain hanging free from the fob, and usually carrying a seal, key, or other trinket.

fob-watch (fob'woch), n. A watch carried in the fob.

Fob watches were not indeed unknown, for a fob watch is in existence that belonged to Oliver Cromwell.
S. Dowell, Taxes in England, III. 307.

focaget (fō'käj), n. [< ML. focagium, a partly restored form of focgium, a reflex of OF. focage,
focus, a hearth: see focus.] Housebote or firebote.

focal (fō'kal), a. [= F. focal, < L. focus, focus:
see focus.] Of or pertaining to a focus: as, a focal point.

To live.
Live, as the snake does in his noisome fen!
Live, as the wolf does in his bone-strewn den!
Live, clothed with cursing like a robe of fame,
The focal point of million-fingered shame!
Whittier, The Panorama.

Focal axis, that axis of a conic which passes through the foci. Focal conic, ellipse, hyperbola, a locus of foci of a quadric surface. Focal curve. See curve. Focal depth. See depth. Focal distance. (a) In conic sec- tions, the distance of the focus from some fixed point:
namely, from the vertex in the parabola, and from the center in the ellipse and hyperbola. (b) In optics, of a mirror or lens, the distance (also called the focal length) from its center to the principal focus (see focus): of a telescope, the distance between the focal plane and the object-glass. Focal lesion, in pathol., lesion of the brain of limited size. Focal line, the locus of foci of a quad-ric cone. Focal plane, in optics, the locus of the foci of infinitely distant objects, with reference to a lens. Focal property, any property of a geometrical locus depending on lines or planes common to the locus and to the absolute, and especially on the intersections of such lines and planes. Umbilical focal conic, a focal conic passing through the umbilics of a quadric surface.

focalization (fō'kal-i-zä'shən), n. [< focalize
+ -ation.] The art or process of bringing to a focus, or of placing in focus.

Focalization in the eye (eye-camera).
Sci. Amer., N. S., LVI. 261.

focalize (fō'kal-iz), v. t.; pret. and pp. focalized, ppr. focalizing. [< focal + -ize.] To bring to a focus; focus.

Light is focalized in the eye, sound in the ear.
Dr. Quinery.

focaloid (fō'kal-oid), n. [< focal + -oid.] In math., an infinitely thin shell bounded by two confoveal ellipsoidal surfaces.

The attraction of a homogeneous solid ellipsoid is the same through all external space as the attraction of a homogeneous focaloid of equal mass coinciding with its surface. Thomson and Tait, Nat. Phil., § 494.

Thick focaloid, a thick shell so bounded.

foci, n. Plural of focus.

focil¹ (fō'sil), n. [= OF. focile, F. focile = Pr.
focil = lg. focile = lt. focile, < ML. focile (foc- ile majus and focile minus), prob. (by confusion with focile, E. fusil¹) for fusil¹*, lit. a spindle: see fusil².] One of the bones of the forearm or of the leg, distinguished as the greater focil (ulna or tibia) and the lesser focil (tibia or fibula).

I was hastily fetch'd to assist one Mr. Powell, a barberchirurgion, in the setting of a fracture of both the foels of the leg in a man about 60 years of age, of a tough dry body. Wiseman, Surgery, vi. 1.

focillater (fōs'i-lät), v. t. [< L. focillatus, pp. of focillare, focillare, also deponent, focillari, revive by warmth, resuscitate, cherish, < focus, a fireplace, hearth: see focus.] To warm; cherish. Blount.

focillation (fōs-i-lä'shən), n. [< focillate +
-ion.] A warming, as at a hearth; a cherishing; comfort; support.

focimeter (fō-sim'e-tēr), n. [< NL. focus + L.
metrum, a measure.] An optical instrument for finding the focus of a lens.

focus (fō'kus), n.; pl. foci (-sī). [A mod.
(NL) use (introduced by Kepler in 1604) of

L. focus, a fireplace, a hearth (ML. also the seat or central point of a disease). Hence ult.
(< L. focus) fusil¹ = fusil² = fusil³, fouage, fouage, fouage, fouage, etc.] 1. In optics, a point at which rays of light that originally diverged from one point meet again, or a point from which they appear to proceed. The former is called a real, the latter a virtual focus. The principal focus of a lens is the focus of rays striking the lens parallel to its axis. The conjugate foci of a mirror or lens are two points so situated that the rays emitted from a luminous body at either point are reflected (by the mirror) or refracted (by the lens) to the other. See conjugate mirror (under con- jugate), lens, and mirror.

A focus . . . may be defined as the point to which a spherical wave converges, or from which it diverges. It may also be defined as the point at which little waves from all parts of a great wave arrive at the same time.
Airy, Optics, § 41.

Every lens which becomes thicker towards its periphery has virtual foci; and vice versa, for the focus of a lens to be real, the lens must be thicker in the middle than at the edge. Loomis, Light (trans.), p. 90.

2. In geom., a point from which the distances to any point of a given curve are in a syzygetic relation. Thus, the sum of the distances of any point of an ellipse from its foci is constant, and the difference of the distances of any point of a hyperbola from its foci is constant. A modern definition is that the foci are the intersections of common tangents of the curve and the absolute. In like manner, a focus of a surface is a point on the curve of intersection of common tangent planes of the surface and the absolute. See cuts under Cartesian and ellipse.

3. In the theory of perspective, with reference to two planes in perspective, one of four points —two, F₁ and F₂, on one plane, and two, f₁ and f₂, on the other—such that the angles between two points on the first plane measured at F₁ are equal to the angles between the corresponding points on the other plane measured at f₁, and so with the pair of foci F₂ and f₂. One pair of foci are called similar, because the angles are measured in the same direction on the two planes; the other pair are called dissimilar, because the angles are measured in opposite directions.

4. Figuratively (with a consciousness of the classical Latin meaning), a central or gathering point, like the fire or hearth of a household; the point at or about which anything is concentrated; a center of interest or attraction.

The virtue and wisdom of a whole people collected into one focus. Burke, Rev. in France.

Tell not as new what every body knows,
And, new or old, still hasten to a close;
There, centring in a focus round and neat,
Let all your rays of information meet.
Comper, Conversation, l. 239.

A public house is generally the focus from which gossip radiates. Mrs. Gaskell, Sylvia's Lovers, xxi.

Acoustic focus, a point to which sound-waves are converged, as by reflection in the case of a room having an ellipsoidal ceiling. Focus of mean motion, the empty focus of the orbit of a planetary body; so called because when the orbit is nearly circular the planet describes in equal times nearly equal angles about this focus as a vertex. Focus of true motion, that focus of the orbit of a planetary body which is occupied by the central body. Heat-focus, the point to which the invisible heat-rays are converged, as those from the sun by a convex lens.
— In focus, situated or fixed at a focal point, or so as to secure or exhibit a focal effect; said (1) of the condition of an image projected by a lens, or seen through a lens, when this image appears sharp and clearly defined; (2) of the position of the lens with reference to a screen or ground-glass upon which such image is projected, or of the position of the screen or ground glass with reference to the lens; (3) of a photographic positive or negative picture accurately produced by the agency of a lens.

While your head is still under the focusing-cloth, pass your hand round to the lens, and move the rack backward and forward till you find the point at which it is most distinct. It is then said to be "in focus," or "sharp."
Silver Shamrock, Int.

focus (fō'kus), v. t.; pret. and pp. focused or focussed, ppr. focusing or focussing [< focus, n.]
To bring or adjust to a focus; cause to be in focus; focalize; collect in one point; concentrate.

Abstraction is focussing, whether by sense or by Intellect. G. H. Lewes, Probs. of Life and Mind, Int., l. 48.

This chapter leaves on the reader's mind the impression that its author has not thought out Federalism or been at much pains to focus his thoughts.

Westminster Rev., CXXV. 240.

focusing-cloth (fō'kus-ing-kloth), n. In pho- tog., a piece of opaque fabric, preferably of a dark color, large enough to envelop the camera and the head and shoulders of the operator, used in bringing a picture to focus to render the image projected by the lens on the ground-glass distinctly visible by the exclusion of other light than that passing through the lens.

If the camera needs to be placed in the sunshine, throw the focusing cloth over it before the shutter is drawn out to make the exposure. Lea, Photography, p. 48.

focusing-frame (fō'kus-ing-frām), n. In a photographic camera, the frame which holds the ground-glass used in focusing to receive the image projected by the lens.

The ground glass is also removed; the negative to be copied is secured in the focusing-frame in its place.

L. A. Photography, p. 383.

focusing-glass (fō'kus-ing-glās), n. A small pocket magnifying-glass, sometimes with a shade to exclude the light, used in examining the image projected on the ground-glass of a photographic camera.

fodder¹ (fod'ēr), n. [ME. fodbler, foddur, foder, fodder; < AS. fōder (rare and improp. gen. dat. fōthers, fōthra), fōddor, fōddus, food, esp. for cattle, fodder; = D. voder = LG. voder, vōer = OHG. fūotar, MHG. vuter, G. futter, food, fodder, provender; = Ice. fōðr = Sw. Dan. foder, fodder; the same, but with different suffix, as AS. fōda, E. food; see foad]. Hence ult. foadg, foagy.] Food for cattle, horses, and sheep, as hay, straw, and other kinds of vegetables. The word is usually confined to food that grows above ground and is fed in bulk.

The sheep for fodder follow the shepherd.

Shak., T. G. of V., i. 1.

This was at once the mystery and misery of Mike's existence, often pausing between pulls at the fodder, after he had finished his corn, to consider it.

W. M. Baker, New Timothy, p. 182.

Further on, . . . glistening stalks of fodder . . . caught the level gleaming from the west, as might the rides of a regiment that has been ordered to fire lying down.

Harper's Mag., LXXVI. 212.

= Syn. See feed, n.

fodder¹ (fod'ēr), v. t. [*ME. fōdderen, fōtheren, < AS. fōðrian (implied in deriv. fōðere, fōddere, forager) = D. voderen = LG. voderen, vōren = G. fūtern = Ice. fōðra = Sw. fōdra = Dan. fōdre, fodder; from the noun.] 1. To feed with dry food or cut grass, etc.; supply with hay, straw, etc.; as, farmers fodder their cattle twice or thrice in a day.

Salt herbage for the foddering rack provide.

To fill their bags, and swell the milky tide.

Dequien, tr. of Virgil's Georgics, iii.

2*t.* To graze, as cattle.

Let the cases be filled with natural earth (such as is taken the first half spit from just under the turf of the best pasture-ground), in a place that has been well foddered on.

Evelyn, Calendarium Hortense, May.

fodder² (fod'ēr), n. A variety of *fodder*¹.

fodderer (fod'ēr-ēr), n. [ME. not found; AS. fōðere, a fodderer, forager; *< fōðrian; see *fodder*¹, v. t.] One who fodders cattle.

foder, n. and v. An obsolete form of *foad*¹.

fodge (foj), n. [Se.; cf. equiv. *fudge*¹ and *fudge*².] A fat, puffy-checked person.

fodgel (foj'el), a. and n. [Se.; also fuggel; cf. fudge.] 1. a. Fat; stout; plump.

If in your bound ye chance to light

Upon a fine, fat, foggel wight.

O stature short, but genius bright,

That she, mark well.

Burns, Capt. Grose's Peregrinations.

II. n. A fat person.

fodient (fō'di-ent), a. and n. [< L. fodiens (t)-s, pp. of fodere, dig, dig up, dig out; see fossil.] 1. a. Digging; throwing up with a spade.

Blount, —2. In zool.: (a) Digging; fossorial. (b) Of or pertaining to the Fodientia: as, a fodient edentate.

II. n. One of the Fodientia.

The fodients are only two, perhaps three, species in number.

Stapel, Nat. Hist., V. 69.

Fodientia (fō-di-en'shi-ē), n. pl. [NL.; < L. fodient (t)-s, pp. of fodere, dig, + -ia.] The fodient edentate mammals, a suborder of Bruta or Edentata, comprising only the armadillos, family Ormyzomidae.

foe (fo), n. [< ME. fo, fow, fa, fua, pl. fos, foos, far, fuas, also fon, fone, fan, faw, a foe, an enemy; < AS. go fah, a foe, < go + fah, fag, pl. fa, adj. guilty, criminal, outlawed, hostile (never as a noun, for which go-fah or fah-man, but usually fend; see fend); = OHG. go-fah, MHG. go-fach, hostile; prob. connected with foth, fath, n., fraud, deception, ho-fathen, overreach, defraud; ult. from the same root as foad, AS. fōad, an enemy; see fend. Hence ult. foad, orig. the abstract noun of the orig. adj. form of foe.] 1. An enemy; one who enters into hatred, grudge, or malice against another.

I have been taught, that am my foe,

So would I none be come to my foe.

King Henry the 4., I. 1. 50, p. 9

Best of a furnace for your foe so hot

That it do singe your foe. Shak., Hen VIII., I. 1

From the testimony of friends as well as of foes, . . . it is plain that these teachers of virtue had all the vices of their neighbours.

Macauley, Lord Bacon.

2. An enemy in war; one of a nation or people at war with another, whether personally inimical or not; a hostile or opposing army; an adversary.

He fought great battails with his salvage foe.

Spenser, F. Q., II. x. 10.

Choose thee either three years' famine, or three months to be destroyed before thy foes.

1 Chron., xxi. 11, 12.

Shall victor exult, or in death be laid low,

With his back to the field, and his feet to the foe?

Campbell, Lochiel's Warning.

3. An opponent; a malevolent or hostile agent or principle; as, a foe to all measures of reform; intemperance is a foe to thrift.

Time-pleasers, flatterers, foes to nobleness.

Shak., Cor., iii. 1.

Some foe to his upright intent

Finds out his weaker part.

Cooper, Human Frailty.

4. One who or that which injures, harasses, or hinders anything; as, the climate is a foe to grape-culture.

To plant and tree an open foe is she [the goose].

Palladius, Husbandrie (E. E. T. S.), p. 26.

Mirth and opium, raptalia and tears,

The daily anodyne, and nightly draught,

To kill those foes to fair ones, time and thought.

Pope, Moral Essays, ii. 112.

= Syn. Antagonist, Opponent, etc. See adversary.

foedera (fē'de-rā), n. pl. [L., pl. of fœdus (fœder), a league, treaty; see federal.] International transactions or facts, and the records relating to them.

The celebrated foedera with Carthage, so much discussed of late.

Encyc. Brit., XIII. 131.

foederalt, foederalyt. Obsolete spellings of federal, federally.

foedifragoust, a. See fedifragous.

foedityt, n. See fedity.

foehn, föhn (fēn), n. [G. föhn or fön, a storm, < MHG. (not found), < OHG. fōma, f., fōmo, m., a rain-wind, whirlwind; possibly ult. due to L. Favonius, the west wind; see favonian.] A warm, dry wind which descends from the upper Alps into the valleys on the north side of the chain of the Alps, from Geneva to Salzburg. Its direction is from the south, less often from the south-west, and it is felt most in the valleys having a general north-and-south trend. It is most common in the autumn and winter, and exerts an important influence upon the meteorological condition of the places subject to it; for example, by rapidly removing the snow in spring, ripening the grapes in autumn, etc. A similar warm, dry wind is recognized in other parts of the world, as on the west coast of Greenland and in New Zealand. The chinook wind of the northwestern United States is a similar phenomenon.

Of local winds the most remarkable are the Föhn, in the Alps, distinguished for its warmth and dryness, etc.

Encyc. Brit., VIII. 690.

We have had a bit of the Greenland foehn. The barometer rose a quarter of an inch during the day.

A. W. Greely, Arctic Service, II. 10.

foehood (fō'hūd), n. [< fœ + -hood.] Enmity; hostility.

Have you forgotten S. Hierome's and Rutilius's deadlie foehood which was wrung over the world?

Ep. Bidel, Of certain Letters, ii. 325.

foeman (fō'man), n.; pl. foemen (-men). [< ME. fōman, fōmon, < AS. fahman, fahmon, foeman, < fah, hostile, + man, man.] An active enemy; one who is in open enmity with or engaged in hostilities against another or others.

Unto his hemman Balida he tolde,

That in his heres all his strengthe lay,

And falsly to his foemen he him sold.

Chaucer, Monk's Tale, I. 75.

Give me this man; he presents no mark to the enemy: the foeman may with as great aim level at the edge of a penknife.

Shak., 2 Hen. IV., iii. 2.

So this great brand the king

Took, and by this will beat his foemen down.

Tennyson, Coming of Arthur.

Fœniculum (fē-nik'ū-lum), n. [L.; see fennel.] A small genus of umbelliferous plants, natives of the Mediterranean region, glabrous, with divided leaves and an aromatic odor. The principal species is the fennel, F. vulgare. See fennel.

fœnugreek, n. See fennugreek.

foeshipt, n. [< ME. fōschip; < fœ + -ship.] Enmity.

The fœke sayde, "no *foeshipt*oure tader hatz the schewed."

Alliterative Poems (ed. Morris), ii. 918.

fœtal, fœtation, etc. See fetal, etc.

fœtid, fœtor. See fetid, fetor.

fog¹ (fog), n. [< Dan. fog, spray, shower, drift, storm, in comp. sne-fog, a snow-storm, blinding fall of snow, = Ice. foh, spray, any light thing tossed by the wind, a snow-drift; cf. fuk, a snow- storm, < fjuka (pret. fauk, pp. fokian), be driven on, be tossed by the wind (of spray, snow, dust, etc.), = Sw. fjuka (cleasly) = Dan. fuge, drift, colloq. rush, dial. fuge, rain fine and blow.] 1. The aggregation of a vast number of minute globules of water in the air near the earth's surface, usually produced by the cooling of the air below the dew-point, whereby a portion of its vapor is condensed. The cooling may be the result of radiation, conduction, mixture with colder air, or ascension. Over surfaces of water warmer than the air the fog produced by cooling is increased by the continued evaporation of the water into the already saturated air. Solid particles in the air constitute nuclei for condensation, and are thereby great promoters of the formation of fog. In a ship's log book, abbreviated f.

Therefore the winds, piping to us in vain,

As in revenge, have suck'd up from the sea

Contagious fogs. Shak., M. N. D., ii. 2.

Beyond the difference in the place of origin there is really little or no distinction to be drawn between a fog and a cloud. A fog is a cloud resting on the earth; a cloud is a fog floating high in the air.

Huxley, Physiography, p. 44.

Hence—2. A state of mental obscurity or confusion: as, to be in a fog of doubt.

One fighting with death in the fog of a typhoid fever.

G. W. Holmes, Old Vol. of Life, p. 50.

3. In photog., a uniform coating covering a developed plate, more or less destructive to the picture in proportion to its opacity. It results from chemical impurities, from exposure of the sensitized film to light, from errors in manipulation, etc.

On the deepest shades should be a pure photographic deposit, and not fog. Workshop Receipts, 1st ser., p. 273.

Green fog, in photog., a coating or discoloration of the same nature as red fog, but greenish in color.—Red fog, in photog., a more or less opaque reddish discoloration in those parts of dry-plate negatives which should be clear. It may result from over-development, from impurities in the developing solutions, from their non-concordance chemically with the brand of plate used, or from imperfection in the manufacture of the plate. = Syn. 1. Mist, haze, etc. See rain, n.

fog¹ (fog), v.; pret. and pp. fogged, ppr. fogging. [*< fog*¹, n.] 1. trans. 1. To envelop with or as with fog; shroud in mist or gloom; obscure; befog. [Rare.]

That the light of divine truth may shine clear in them, and not be fogged and misled with filthy vapours.

Leighton, Commentary on Peter, i.

2. To cloud or coat with a uniform coating or discoloration, as in photography: as, an over-alkaline developer will fog the plate. See *fog*¹, n., 3.

To prevent the mishap of fogged plates [in photography] from scattering and extraneous light. Science, I. 94.

II. intrans. 1. To become covered or filled with fog.—2. In photog., to become clouded or coated with a uniform coating or discoloration: said of a negative in course of development. See *fog*¹, n., 3.

A peculiar change of colour in the high lights of the picture . . . takes place just before fogging commences.

Workshop Receipts, 1st ser., p. 254.

fog² (fog), n. [E. dial. also fog; < ME. fogge, grass (see extract); perhaps of Celtic origin. W. flog, dry grass.] 1. Aftergrass; a second growth of grass; aftermath; also, long grass that remains on land through the winter; fog-gage. [Eng.]

He takes forth on alle fenne, fogge watz his mete [compare Dan. iv., 33].

Alliterative Poems (ed. Morris), ii. 1683.

One with another they would be and play,

And in the deep fog batten all the day.

Deighton, Moon Calf, p. 512.

2. Moss. [Scotch.]

A rowing [rolling] stone gathers nae fog.

Scotch Proverbs (Ramsay), p. 153.

fog² (fog), v.; pret. and pp. fogged, ppr. fogging. [*< fog*², n.] 1. trans. 1. To feed off the fog or pasture in winter: as, to fog cattle.—2. To cut off the fog from: as, to fog a field. [Eng. in both senses.]

II. intrans. 1. To become covered with fog or moss. [Scotch.]

About this town [Peebles] both fruit and forest trees have a smoother skin than elsewhere, and are seldom seen either to fog or be bark-bound.

Fennecik, Tweeddale, p. 31.

fog³ (fog), v. i. [Developed from *fagger*¹, q. v.] To seek gain by base or servile practices (whence pettifogger).

As for the fogging proctorage of money, with such an eyes-stroke Gheezl with Leprosy, and Simon Magus with a curse, so does she [Excommunication] look, and so threaten her fiery whip. Milton, Reformation in Eng., ii.

We're not for us, then swad (quoth he),

Where wouldst thou fog to get a fee? Dryden.

fog⁴ (fog), a. [E. dial., formerly also foggy; origin obscure; cf. *faggy*¹.] Gross; fat; clumsy.

A fowle fog monster, great swad, deprived of eyesight.

Stanhurst, Aneid, iii. 672.

2. A metallic substance formed into very thin sheets by rolling and hammering: as, gold, tin, or lead foil. Gold foil is beaten out to the utmost tenacity. Tin foil has a sheet alloy of copper, lead, etc. Dutch foil is made by rolling a plate of copper coated with silver into thin sheets, polishing the silver surface, varnishing it, and then laying on a coat of transparent color mixed with isinglass. A variegated Japanese foil is made by combining thin sheets of different metals in a single plate, which is so treated that the different metals or alloys show in the completed sheet like the lines or figures on a Damascus blade. These sheets are extremely flexible, and can be stamped, engraved, etc., for decorative use.

Whose walls were high, but nothing strong nor thick,
And golden foils all over them displayed.

Spenser, F. Q., I. iii. 4

Gold in the form of foil, or in that condition known as sponge-gold, tin in the form of foil, and amalgams, etc., are the principal material in use as stoppings (for teeth).

Engage, Brit., VII. 98.

3. In jewelry, a thin leaf of metal placed under a precious stone to change its color, or to give it more color in case of its being inferior in that respect, or to give it additional luster by the reflection of light from the surface of the metal. Much old jewelry is made with thin and poor stones, to which effect is given by this means.

The stone had need to be rich that is set without foil, Bacon, Ceremonies and Respects (ed. 1887).

So diamonds owe a lustre to their foil. Pope.

4. Leaf-metal placed behind translucent enamel for the same purpose as that used for precious stones. (See def. 3.) In this sense often called patillon (which see). Hence—5. Anything of a different color or of different qualities which serves to adorn or set off another thing to advantage; that which, by comparison or contrast, sets off or shows more conspicuously the superiority of something else.

This brilliant is so spotless and so bright,
He needs no foil, but shines by his own proper light.

Dryden, Character of a Good Parson, l. 140.

The general good sense and worthiness of his character make his friends observe these little singularities as foils that rather set off than blench his good qualities.

Addison, Sir Roger at Church.

6. An amalgam of tin with quicksilver laid on one side of a sheet of glass to produce a reflecting surface in making a mirror.

Foille [F.], . . . the foyle of precious stones, or looking-glasses; and hence, a grace, beauty, or gloss given unto.

I now begin to see my vanity
Shine in this glass, reflected by the foil.

B. Jonson, Staple of News, v. 1.

7. In medieval arch., a small area in the tracery of a window, panel, etc., which is said to be trefoiled, quatrefoiled, cinquefoiled, multi-foiled, etc., according to the number of arcs which it contains. Foil arch. See arch, 2.

foil² (foil), v. t.

[Early mod. E. also foyle; < ME. foilen, foylene, more commonly in comp. defoulen, defoulen (with irreg. ai, oy, for reg. ou), generally defoulen, trample upon, tread under foot, fig. subdue, oppress (whence in part the mod. sense 'baffle, frustrate,' but see to run the fool, under *fool*², n.), < OF. fouler, foler, folier, trample upon, subdue, defeat, etc., in another form fouler, full (cloth) (mod. F. fouler, trample upon, etc., sprang, full (cloth), etc.), in comp. defouler, defouler, defouler (= Pr. defouler), also afouler, trample upon, tread down, etc., < ML. fulcare (also spelled fulcare, after the OF. form), full cloth, namely by trampling or beating, < L. fulcare, n. fuller; see *fuller*¹ and *full*², 1. To trample upon; tread under foot.

When he did all to pieces break and foil,
In lathy dirt, and left so in the lathy soyle.

Spenser, F. Q., V. vi. 33

8. To foil, commonly called Richard Cœur de Lion, being a proud and indignant, caused the ensigns of a lion to be pulled down and holed under a foot.

Katharine Hist. Turks

2. To baffle; dull; dadden; as, to foil the scent in a race.

When light winged boys
Off their heads caped foil, with wanton dillies, Merrily they, of old-fashioned instruments,
Look, Othello! (3rd Collier)

3. To frustrate; baffle; mislead; render vain or nugatory, as an effort or attempt; thwart; balk; as, the enemy was foiled in his attempt to pass the river.

This your courtesy
Foiled me a second. Ford, Fancies, iv. 1.

And by a mortal man at length am foild.

Dryden, Æneid, i.

His superior craft enabled him to foil every attempt of his enemies.

Prescott, Ferd. and Isa., ii. 1.

The plot was a good plot, but the admiral of France was destined to be foiled by an old woman.

Motley, Dutch Republic, l. 168.

= Syn. 3. Thwart, Baffle, etc. See frustrate.

foil² (foil), n. [Early mod. E. also foyle; < ME. foyle; < *foil*², v.] 1. The track or trail of game when pursued.

Sometimes, all day, we hunt the tedious Foil.

Congreve, tr. of Ovid's Art of Love.

2. Defeat; frustration; failure when on the point of achievement.

Never had the Turkish Emperor
So great a foil by any foreign foe.

Marlowe, Tamburlaine, l. iii. 3.

Death never won a stake with greater foil,
Nor e'er was fate so near a foil.

Dryden.

3. In wrestling, a partial fall; a fall not complete according to the rules.

If he be only endangered, and makes a narrow escape, it is called a foil.

R. Carey, quoted in Strutt's Sports and Pastimes, p. 150.

Look, how many foils go to a fair fall, so many excuses to a full lie. Fletcher and Rowley, Maid in the Mill, iv. 1.

And three indirect insinuations will go as far in law towards giving a downright lie as three foils will go towards a fall in wrestling.

Dryden, Duchess of York's Paper Defended.

To put to (the) foil, to mar; to blench.

For several virtues
Have I lik'd several women; never any
With so full soul, but some defect in her
Did quarrel with the noblest grace she ow'd,
And put it to the foil.

Shak., Tempest, iii. 1.

For myne maks, and mars (say they), and coyne it keeps the coyle.

It binds the beare, it rules the roste, it puts all things to foyle.

Draut, tr. of Horace's Satires, i.

To run the foil, in hunting, to run over the same track a second time in order to put the hounds at fault; said of game.

No hare when hardly put to it by the hounds, and running foil, makes more doublings and redoublings than the fetch compass, circuits, turns, and returns in this their intricate peregrination.

Fulter, Pisgah Sight, IV. iii. 6.

To take the foil, to accept discomfiture or defeat. Ducies.

Sundrie of theyme then of the common counsell of the Cite, standinge upon their reputation, and mynyngze not to take the foyle, stande to meane tyme and defende theyre cause.

English Gilds (E. E. T. S.), p. 304.

Restir thee, Jacques, take not now the foil,
Lest thou didst lose what fortime thou didst gain.

Greene, Friar Bacon, p. 168.

foil³ (foil), n. [Prob. < *foil*², v., 2, in the lit. sense 'blunt'; but examples of this sense are wanting.] A bated or blunted sword used in fencing-practice and friendly contests; now, usually, an implement used in fencing-schools, for small-sword practice only. It has a blade of small quadrangular section, a button on the point, and for the guard two open lunettes or loops, which it is common to reinforce by "shells" of thick leather. The French fencing masters and amateurs distinguish between the fleuret or light foil and the epee d'escrime, which is like the duelling-sword or epee de combat, except in having a buttoned point, and is therefore much heavier than the fleuret. See fleuret.

Bene, Thy wit is as quick as the greyhound's mouth, it catches.

Mary, And yours as blunt as the fencer's foils, which hit, but hurt not.

Shak., Much Ado, v. 2.

Against Friends at first with Foils we fence.

Congreve, Pyrrhus, Prol.

foil⁴ (foil), v. t. [ME. foilen, foylene, a rare and improp. form (by confusion with foilen, foylene, *foil*², q. v.) of foiden, fylen, defile (cf. ME. defoulen for defoulen, defylen, defile); see *file*², foill, v., and *defile*¹, defoull.] To defile; same as *file*², foill.

foilable (foi'la-bl), a. [< *foil*² + -able.] Capable of being foiled.

foil-carrier (foi'kar'i-ēr), n. A kind of dental pliers for holding gold foil or other filling for teeth.

foiled (foild), a. [< *foill*¹ + -ed.] In medieval arch., having foils; as, a foiled arch.

foiler (foi'ler), n. One who foils or frustrates; one who thwarts or baffles.

foiling¹ (foi'ling), n. [< *foill*¹ + -ing.] In arch., a foil.

foiling² (foi'ling), n. [Verbal n. of *foil*², tread.] In hunting, the slight mark of a passing deer on the grass.

foil-stone (foi'stōn), n. An imitation jewel. Simmonds.

foin¹ (foin), v. [Early mod. E. also foyne; < ME. foynen (once var. fiacen), thrust at (with a weapon), rarely tr., pierce, prob. < OF. foine, foyne, foine, foinne, foine, F. foine, a pitchfork, a fish-spear (> F. dial. foinier, catch fish with a spear), prob. < L. fuscinus, a three-pronged spear, a trident (Littre); hardly < L. fočina, lit. 'digger' (fočina occurs only in sense of a pit, mine, 'digging'), < foedere, dig (Scheler). The particular use of foin in fencing may be due in part to F. dial. foindre, for F. foindre, feign: see feign, feint.] I. intrans. To thrust with a weapon; push; as in fencing; let drive.

He hewd and lasht, and foynd, and thondred blowes.

Spenser, F. Q., II. v. 9.

Than they assembled togider in al partes, and began to foyne with speares and stryke with axes and swordes.

Berners, tr. of Froissart.

Rogero never found, and seldom strake

But flating.

Sir J. Harrington, tr. of Ariosto, xl. 78.

II. trans. To thrust through with a weapon; pierce; stab.

He egerlyche to Charlis ran
And hente hym by the nekke than,
And foynde hym with that knyfe.

Sir Ferunbras, l. 5640.

foin¹ (foin), n. [Early mod. E. also foyne; < *foin*¹, v.] A thrust; a push.

At hand strokes they used not swordes, but pollaxes; which be mortal as well in sharpness as in weight, both for foynes and down strokes.

Sir T. More, Utopia (tr. by Robinson), ii. 184.

It shall not be lawful to the challengers, nor to the answerers, with the bastard sword to give or offer any foyne to his match.

Quoted in Strutt's Sports and Pastimes, p. 15.

folk-frith (fōk'frith), n. In Anglo-Saxon law, the rightful peace of the whole people. Men having a controversy with each other were not allowed to settle it by violence without first obtaining leave of the people on showing sufficient cause. To fight without leave was a breach of the folk frith.

The conquerors came as "folks"; and the very existence of a folk implied a "folk frith" of the community as a whole.

J. R. Green, Conq. of Eng., p. 22.

folkland (fōk'land), n. [A mod. form, repr. AS. folcland, < folc, the people, + land, land.] In old Eng. law, the land of the folk or people, as distinguished from bookland, which was held by charter or deed. It comprised the whole area that was not assigned to individuals or communities at the original allotment, and that was not subsequently divided into estates of bookland. (Stubbs, Const. Hist., 360.) It corresponded to the ager publicus of the Romans.

The folkland, the common land of the community or of the nation, out of which the ancient allodial possessions were carved.

E. A. Freeman, Norman Conquest, I. 63.

Portions of the folkland might be, and frequently were, turned into private property by grant from the sovereign power; or, without altering the ultimate public property in the land, the possession and enjoyment of it might be, and constantly were, let out to individuals.

E. Pollock, Land Laws, p. 29.

folk-lore (fōk'lōr), n. [< folk + lore; first suggested by Mr. Thoms in 1846 ("Athenæum," 1846, p. 862), in imitation of G. compounds like volkslied, 'folk-song,' volksapen, popular epic, etc.] The lore of the common people; the traditional beliefs and customs of the people, especially such as are obsolete or archaic; traditional knowledge; popular superstitions, tales, traditions, or legends.

Among the proofs of his [William John Thoms's] hapiness of hitting on names may be cited his . . . invention of the word folk-lore. N. and Q., 6th ser., XII. 141.

Mr. Gomme offers as a definition of the science of folk-lore the following: it is "the comparison and identification of the survivals, archaic beliefs, customs, and traditions in modern ages."

 in comp. font = Dan. font, in comp. font, font, a font, < MLG. font), a baptismal font, a particular use of L. font), a fountain, spring.

From the ME. font, a font, parallel to font, mes F. font, now used chiefly in the orig.
L. sense 'a spring,' which is in both cases later in F. sense than the baptismal sense, and in *font*¹ is to be referred directly to the L.; see *font*¹.]

1. A repository for the water used in baptism;

now, specifically, a basin, usually of marble or other fine stone, permanently fixed within a church, to contain the water for baptism by sprinkling or immersion; distinctively called a baptismal font. Ritually its proper position is near the entrance of the church, but it is very commonly placed near the chancel. In the early ages of the church the font was placed in a separate building or chapel called the baptistery; and this usage has maintained itself in some regions, notably in Italy. By the eleventh century it had become customary to locate the font within the main church edifice. The earliest medieval fonts were of considerable size, as it was then the practice to administer the rite by immersion. They were usually of massive stone or marble, and even the oldest surviving examples are, as a rule, richly sculptured. See baptistery.

Font, Cathedral of Langres, France; end of 13th century.
 (From Viollet-le-Duc's "Dict. de l'Architecture.")

Who from her native font, as proudly she doth flow,
 Her handmaids Manian bath, and Hespier, her to bring To Rathan. Drayton, Polyolbion, x. 110.

Holy-water font, a basin or receptacle for holy water in Roman Catholic churches; a bénitier or stomp. Formerly also called holy-water stock, stone, stoup, vat, etc. See cut under bénitier.

font² (fôn), n. [In sense 2, also fount; < F.
fonte, a casting, a founding, a cast, a east of type, a font, < foudre, melt, east, found; see found.] 1. A casting; the act or process of casting; founding.

When the theme was ready to be cast in bronze, Michelangelo seems suddenly to have remembered that, as he knew nothing of the processes of the font, he could not go on without the assistance of a skilled workman.

C. C. Perkins, Italian Sculpture, p. 273.

2. A complete assortment and just apportionment of all the characters of a particular face and size of printing-type, as required for ordinary printed work. The ordinary font of 500 pounds of Roman and Italic type for book- or newspaper-work in the English language is divided in about the following proportions: small or lower case letters, 265 pounds; capital letters, 37 pounds; small capital letters, 17 pounds; figures, 14 pounds; points and references, 20 pounds; braces, dashes, fractions, etc., 12 pounds; spaces and quad-rats, 19 pounds; Italic letters, 36 pounds. For other languages than English different apportionments are necessary.

 thol.*, an opening for the discharge of pus.—

2. A vacancy between bones of the skull of a young animal, due to incompleteness of the process of ossification. The principal fontanelles of the human infant's skull are at the corners of the parietal bones, between these and the frontal, occipital, and sphenoidal, respectively. The frontoparietal fontanelle is the largest and lasts the longest, causing the "soft spot" which may be felt just above the forehead.

The fontanelles remain patent (in rickets) much longer than in a healthy infant.

Quain, Med. Dict.

3. Some similar opening between other bones, as in the scapular arch of some batrachians.

Also fonticul.
Coracoli fontanelle, in Batrachia. See coracoid, and fontange (fôn-fônzh'), n. [F., after the Duchesse de Fontanges, one of the mistresses of Louis XIV. See def.] A head-dress fashionable in the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries. It arose from the use of a ribbon by the Duchesse (then Mademoiselle) de Fontanges (about 1680) to fasten her coiffure when her hair had blown out, with bows falling gracefully over the brow. The name was applied to many modifications of the original simple ribbon or band of lace. A cap with trimmings of lace, and later a high head dress similar to the commode, were successively called by this name.

The Duchess of Burgundy immediately imitated, and appeared in a fontange of the new standard.

Gulliver's Travels, p. 106.

fontanieri, n. See fountainier.

Fontarabian (fon-ta-ra'-bi-an), n. [< Fontarabia, Sp. Fuenterabia, in Spain, + -an.] Of or pertaining to Fontarabia or Fuenterabía, a town in northern Spain near the French frontier, near which occurred the defeat of the rear-guard of Charlemagne's army by the Saracens and the death of Roland; hence, relating to this battle in the legends of Roland.

1. In man and other vertebrate animals, the terminal part of the leg, upon which the body rests in standing; one of the pedal extremities.

Thou makes the tor to kysse His mouth by demoyone and gastly prayere, but thou treis apone his feet and delectous thame.

Hampele, Prose Treatises (E. E. T. S.), p. 28.

If the foot shall say, Because I am not the hand, I am not of the body; as it therefore not of the body?

1 Cor., xii, 15.

Many a light foot shone like a jewel set

In the dark eage. Tennyson, Princess, iii.

In man the feet are the terminal segments of the posterior limbs, corresponding to the hands of the anterior extremities, and extending from the ankle-joint or tibiotarsal articulation to the end of the toes. The foot is divided into three parts, the tarsus or ankle, the metatarsus or instep, and the phalanges, digits, or toes. It contains 26 bones: namely, 7 tarsals, the astragalus, calcaneum, scaphoid cuboid and 3 metacarpal bones; 5 metatarsals; and 14 phalanges, 3 to each of the digits except the great toe, which has 2. The axis of the foot is at right angles with that of the leg, and the whole sole rests upon the ground. The principal muscles acting upon the foot are the anterior and posterior tibial, the three peroneal, the gastrocnemii and solei, and the flexors and extensors of the toes. In many mammals the structure of the foot is much the same as in man, especially in those which are plantigrade; but the term is extended usually to the corresponding segment of the fore limb. In digitigrade mammals which walk upon the toes, as cats and dogs, or upon the ends of the toes, as hoofed quadrupeds, the foot, properly speaking, extends up the limb; thus in the horse, for example, the feet reach up to the hock of the hind limb and the so-called knee of the fore limb (see ent under perissodactyl); but in popular language foot is restricted to the phalangeal part of the foot, which rests on the ground in walking. In birds the foot is properly the whole of the hind limb up to the tibiotarsal joint, commonly but wrongly called the knee, and includes the tarsometatarsus and toes; but it is popularly restricted to the toes alone. In reptiles and batrachians which have limbs, the foot is the terminal segment of either fore or hind limb, as in other vertebrates. The hind foot is technically called the pes.

2. In invertebrate animals, some part serving the purpose of a foot. (a) In mollusks, any surface or part of the body upon which the animal rests or moves. It is often extendible or protrusible, as in gastropods, and is technically called the pedium. See ent under Helicidae and Lamellibranchiata. (b) In insects, specifically, the tarsus. (c) In arthropods, the leg. The modifications of the limbs have different names as arbitrium test or plapids, ambulatoria, etc. (d) In worms, one of the bristly appendages called parapodia. See ent under polychaeta. (e) In echinoderms, a tubular prolongation of the body through an ambulacrum. See tube-foot. (f) In protozoans a temporary prolongation of the body, called a pseudopodium. See pseudopodium.

3. Milit., soldiers who march and fight on foot; infantry as distinguished from cavalry; used collectively for foot-soldiers; as, a regiment of foot; the Tenth (regiment of) foot.

Part wield their arms part curb the foaming steed,

Single or in array of battle ranged.

Both horse and foot, nor idly mustering stood.

Milton, P. L., vi, 645.

Here I leave my second leg,

And the Forty-second foot.

Boad, Faithless Nelly Gray.

4. Something which bears a resemblance to an animal's foot in shape, or in its office as a supporting base, or in its position as a terminus or lowest part.

The groove . . . divides the bottom of the type into two parts called the feet. Encyc. Brit., XVIII, 105.

Specifically: (a) The part of a stocking or boot which receives the foot. (b) A mechanical contrivance acting like the foot of a man in the propulsion of automatic machines. (c) The lower part of the leg of a chair or any other support or shaft.

5. The lowest part or foundation; the part opposite to the head or top; the bottom; also, the last of a row or series: as, the foot of a mountain, of a column, or of a class.

Departing owl of this fors'd church of ower lady, we came to the foot of the Mount of Olyvete.

Tuckerton, Diary of Log. Travels, p. 48.

Waverley, Edith's Ballad, III, 339.

The generous man in the ordinary acceptance, without respect of the demands of his own family, will soon find upon the foot of his account that he has sacrificed to fools, knaves, flatterers, or the diversely unhappy, all the opportunities of affording any future assistance where it ought to be. Stech, Spectator, No. 346.

6. A blow with the foot. [Rare.]

Harry, giving him a slight foot, laid him on the broad of his back.

H. Brooks, Food of Quality, II.

7. The concluding refrain or burden of a song.

Fide, or repeat of a ditty or verse, which is often repeated.

Hobart, 1552.

The leaf, ion, ion; whereof the first is the cry and voice they commonly use to one another to make haste, or else it is the foot of some song of triumph.

North, tr. of Plutarch, p. 11.

8. Footing; basis; principle; used only in the singular.

This distinction set the controversy upon a new foot, and seemed to be very well approved by most that heard it.

Addison, Cole's House, Debates.

I . . . shall take it all if you don't keep up the correspondence on the same foot.

Stech, Letter, No. 355.

9. Regular or normal value or price; par.

Were it not for this easy borrowing upon interest men's necessities would draw upon them most sudden a mending, in that they would be forced to sell their means (be it lands or goods) far under foot.

Bacon, 4 surty red, 1873.

10. A unit of length, originally the length of a man's foot. Abbreviated ft. The English foot (in use in the United States) contains 12 inches, and is equal to 30.48 centimeters. It seems to have slightly lengthened since the time of Henry VII. The foot in use in different European countries before the introduction of the metric system varied from 9 to 21 English inches. The ancient Roman foot is known from a number of extant standards to have been equal to 11.65 English inches. Other ancient feet are of uncertain length even when their existence is not in doubt; especially, there is at present much dispute concerning the Attic foot. (See ancient foot, below.) The following table gives the prevalent opinions concerning the lengths of the ancient feet and well-determined values of the more important modern units of this name, all expressed in English inches:

11. A foot of griststone was formerly 8 inches.

The great curb iron [of 15-l] was nearly 10 feet long, and weighed 4,000 lbs.

W. W. Grocer, The Gun, p. 21.

In this sense foot was formerly, and still is dialectally, often used for the plural as well as in idiomatic combinations like a three foot reflector, an sfoot stop.

The boke with he was xiiii foote of lengthe and half a palm he tweine his browes.

Medley, E. E. T. S., vi, 393.

11. In pros., a group of syllables, of which one is distinguished above the others, which are relatively less marked in enunciation; a section of a rhythmical series consisting of a thesis and an arsis. The Greeks first gave the name foot (πῶς) to the group of times marked by and coincident with one rise and one fall of the human foot in dancing or in beating time. The time or syllable marked alike by the rise or stress of voice, and by the beat of foot or hand in marking time, they accordingly called the thesis (πῶς) or 'setting down' (of the foot), and the remaining interval before or after this the arsis (ῥοιέ) or 'raising' (of the foot). Many Latin and modern writers have introduced great confusion into metrical nomenclature by directly interchanging the meaning of the words arsis and thesis. (See arsis.) An uninterrupted succession of feet constitutes a colon or series, and the name line or verse is given to a colon, cola, or period, if written in one line. In ancient poetry, as in English and other modern languages in which the syllabic accent is chiefly a stress of the voice, the rhythmical ictus regularly coincides with the syllabic accent, and the relative length of time taken in pronouncing a syllable is almost entirely disregarded. In the poetry of the Greeks, Romans, Hindus, and other nations in whose languages the syllable accent was chiefly a matter of tone or pitch, quantity—that is, the length of time taken in pronouncing each syllable—determined the rhythm. In Greek and Roman rhythms and metrics a unit of time is assumed, called a præmeter or fundamental time of anapaest, or specifically a time, and this is regarded as the ordinary or normal short (marked \cup), and expressed in verbal composition by a short syllable. The ordinary or normal long (marked —) is equal to two times or more, and is expressed by a long syllable. Metrical classification of such feet is based either on metrical anapæst—that is, on the length of the foot as measured in mora or times, each long being reckoned as two shorts—or on the pedal ratio—that is, the proportion of the number of times in the the 1st to that in the 2nd.

Cambridge, Metrical Feet.

12. In music: (a) A drone-bass. (b) A chorus or refrain: a burden. (c) In organ-building: (1) The part of a pipe below its mouth. (2) A measure or name used in denoting the pitch of stops. The standard of reference is the length of an open pipe belonging to the second C below middle C. A unison stop is called an 8-foot stop, because in this case the pipe is about 8 feet long. Similarly, an octave stop is called a 4-foot stop; a double or suboctave stop, a 16-foot stop, etc. (See stop.) The usage has been extended to the designation of the pitch of particular tones and of instruments. Thus, the second C below middle C is called 8-foot C, and all the tones in the octave above it 8-foot tones, or tones in the 8-foot octave, while the first C below middle C is called 4-foot C, etc. Thus, also, the piccolo is called a 4-foot instrument, because its tones are an octave above the notes written.

13. The commercial name for one of the small plates of tortoise-shell which line the carapace: commonly used in the plural.—14. One of the small marginal plates of the upper shell of the hawkbill turtle. Also called nose.—15. Sediment: same as foots.

Much of this Waxe had a great foote and is not so faire waxe as in times past we have had. You must cause the foote to be taken off before you doe weize it.
